(A LETTER FROM CARL LAEMMLE)

Mr. Exhibitor Are You Sound Asleep?

Mr. Licensed Exhibitor, doesn't it mean anything to you when you hear from week to week of new licensed exchanges being "bought up" by the trust's newest corporation called the "General Film Co."? Do you think for one blessed minute that the buying and freezing and squeezing of the Licensed exchanges is being done for your sweet benefit? What do you think will happen when the new octopus has bought and gobbled all the exchanges it wants? Do you think it will do any good if you wait until then to assert your independence? Don't you know that you can lick this new trust if you act in time? Don't you know that if enough of you turn independent, the trust will say to itself: "Here, we are losing too much business. We'll have to go a little slower." If you want trust films—if that's what you are after—don't you see that the only way you can keep getting them at a decent price is to prevent the trust from establishing itself in a position to dictate to you? Do you want to give the trust the power to say to you:—"See here, you must raise your price of admission to ten cents instead of five. If you don't you will lose your license." And if you DO raise the price of admission, are you innocent enough to hope that you will make more profit? Don't you see that the only reason the trust wants to compel you to raise your price is so THAT IT CAN DOUBLE ITS RENTAL PRICE TO YOU? For several months I have kept you posted on every move the trust was making and was intending to make. I have NEVER given you a wrong tip. I am telling you now what I know to be the plan. Subsidized tools of the trust will try to laugh it off. They always have tried that game. If you let them do it, the laugh is on you in the end. Roll over! Wake up! Protect your investment. Turn independent NOW, while the turning is GOOD.

Mr. J. H. HALLBERG, New York — Springfield, Ill., Feb., 12, 1910

DEAR SIR:—I wish to compliment your mechanics on the work done on one of my MOTIOGRAPHS that I sent in to be overhauled. I found it as good as new when received. The machine, you will remember, is the first MOTIOGRAPH we installed. It has been used continuously for two years, and the only expense it has put me to is the present overhauling done by your men. We have now in use six MOTIOGRAPHS and we can say for your machine, it is second to NONE. Thanking you very kindly for past and present favors, and wishing you continued success, I remain.

Yours very truly, E. S. SCHULTZ

THANHOUSER FILMS
OF INTEREST TO EXHIBITORS

There is a silly story going the rounds to the effect that we are making only ONE release a week. The rumor is thoroughly false, as everyone who has been watching our work knows. We release a "Thanhouser" every TUESDAY AND FRIDAY. The two "Thanhousers" that are released every week are essential to the well-being of your business. You know this to be so. Make your exchange give you both of 'em. Certainly trade doesn't come so easily in Summer that you can afford to miss a single "Thanhouser" THAT REALLY IS RELEASED AND REALLY IS OBTAINABLE. The next time you're told that we make but ONE release a week, tell the teller to GUESS AGAIN. We're right on the job with TWO, and if you don't get them it's your own fault.

Say "THANHOUSER" to the Exchange Man! Say "THANHOUSER" to the Exchange Man!

Say "THANHOUSER"
To the Exchange Man and You'll get

A THANHOUSER THEME THAT'LL MAKE YOU THINK!

THE MAD HERMIT
RELEASED TUESDAY, AUG. 9th

The theme of the "wrath of a woman scorned" having been worn threadbare by the moving picture producer, the Thanhouser producers here undertake to show the wrath of a MAN scorned—a bold move but a popular one. For the MAN deceived in love can be as wrathy as the woman in that situation and, better, the idea is new and hasn't been "worked to death." In this, you have the ideal warm weather release, with a splendid abundance of the kind of country scene that cools and comforts the Summer patron.

Exhibitors! You Need Us! We Need You!

Have you a profitable theatre? Do you want to keep it yourself? Then why patronize those who would destroy you? That is just what you are doing when you take licensed service.

The $2.00 a week royalty has grown into an immense jackpot which is now available for the absorbtion of theatres. Add to that the amounts paid for film service and it must be plain that you are contributing to the support of an institution which is preparing to devour you.

Awake to a realization! Would you have believed a year ago that proprietors of licensed exchanges would have their business taken away and that they would become mere employees?

How would you relish the idea of becoming the manager of your theatre, hired from week to week, or to see the trust construct a competing theatre next door to you?

Why not be free and Independent? If you will look at the grand program of 20 reels we are releasing weekly it will not take you long to make yonr decision.

Get ready for the fall business by arranging for Independent service. DON'T WAIT UNTIL THE LIGHTNING STRIKES! THE DANGER IS IMMINENT. Every week adds to the big fund. Don't contribute another week.

We have reached the point where we can give you as good film as the trust. With your added support we will pass them in quality and number of releases weekly. The money you spend with us will come back to roost.

YOU NEED US! WE NEED YOU!

A novel and very effective dramatic production which has much merit. "Forgiveness is divine;" and as this picture clearly demonstrates these words, its mission will surely be accomplished. Each scene is exceedingly well acted and of a superior quality photographically.

The Prairie Post Mistress

An appealing story of the Golden West; where greed, charity, love and gratitude each play an important part. The daring riding will stir your senses, only to be quieted by soothing love scenes. A typical western picture, with photography up to the usual standard set by the New York Motion Picture Company.

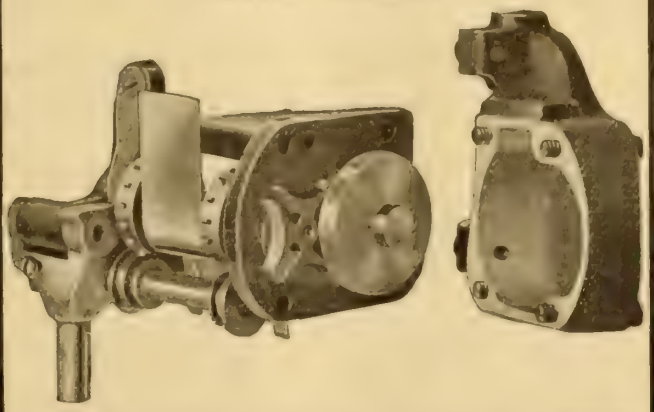
Was the first on the market (by nearly 3 yrs.) to have an

Oil Bath for Geneva Star and Cam



Being completely enclosed in an oil bath, it prevents the intrusion of grit and dirt, preserves the oil, and prevents wear.

A Motiograph user says:-"I have had ONE GENEVA STAR in THREE YEARS for each of the two machines", and they weren't special hand made models and under the supervision of the maker either. They were from regular stock of the 1908 Model. The 1910 Model is 25 per cent. Heavier. The user of another well-known machine says;-

The Yale Film Exchange Service

THE ONLY LICENSED EXCHANGE IN ST. LOUIS

Opened for Business July 25, 1910, With a Complete New Stock

All the Leading Moving Picture Theatres in St. Louis Use the Famous Yale Service! The Reason is Obvious—It is Perfect and Means Success!

We are buying from two to five prints of each and every release each week. Just think what this means to every live manager—an opportunity to select a magnificent program from the world's greatest output of motion pictures.

We also have, in addition to all of the recent releases, 1,000 reels of reprints of carefully selected feature films which we have put in our commercial service. This means much to the exhibitor who uses commercial service, as it enables him to run film that is scratchless, patchless and matchless.

BEING JOBBERS we buy in large lots, all makes of standard machines, repairs, gas-making outfits, current-saving devices, condensers, carbons, tickets, opera chairs and everything used by a modern moving picture theater. WE SELL MACHINES AND SUPPLIES TO OTHER EXCHANGES AND DEALERS!

No theater is too large or too small for the Yale Film Exchange to serve.

THE YALE FILM EXCHANGE

Was built and founded on Truth, and its honest and dependable business methods has placed it in the front ranks

Its position in the film field is as strong and as impregnable as the ROCK OF GIBRALTAR.

The Conception of the Yale Exchange Was Legitimate

The days of the film pirates are numbered; many of the old-time film buccaneers have passed from memory and the few still remaining are tottering on the brink. We cannot help but mourn for those already departed and for the few old piratical commanders still alive we have nothing but sympathy.

We regret that some of the former film exchange captains were so unfortunate as to build their GLASS HOUSES on the treacherous quicksands of misrepresentation, yet as their very inception was illegitimate their final sad ending is really justified.

The day for misrepresentation in the film business is over.

As a word of caution we ask you not to be deceived by the senseless and idiotic advertising stunts of certain unreliable film concerns; some of their mutterings resemble very closely the dying wail of expiring and fast declining so-called film exchanges.

THE YALE RECORD IS CLEAR, THE YALE SERVICE IS SUPREME, AND OUR REFERENCESUNQUESTIONED.

If you haven't time to call, drop us a card and we will be pleased to write or have our representative call upon you and explain more fully the merits of the famous Yale service.

Picture Economics.

In the WORLD of July 16 we printed an article under the caption of "The Arithmetic of the Independent Situation," in which we drew a comparison between the chances of success of the respective elements of the business in this country, namely, the licensed and independent manufacturers. We pointed out that, by the figures available, there were too many independent manufacturers. The independent manufacturers are not making anything like the money that they might, could, or should make; and we propose in this article to give some reasons why this is so, irrespective of the fact that there are too many of those manufacturers.

The article in question stated "in round numbers"—very round numbers—that there were about 10,000 or 11,000 moving picture theaters and other places of amusement which used the moving picture in this country. A well-known member of the trade is inclined to doubt the accuracy of our figures, which are compiled from valuable sources of information. He claims that there are no less than 30,000 places of amusement in this country using the moving picture. We hope this is true. If it is, it shows that the possibilities of the business are greater than are commonly supposed.

The object of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD is, as we have said over and over again, to promote the business interests of the picture amongst exhibitors, renters, manufacturers and the public. We want to see them all making money by legitimate means. It is better for themselves, for the business, and for us, that they should prosper. But they cannot prosper, except that it be along clearly marked out, definite business lines. Let us consider the making of a picture. Over and over again we have pointed out that the making of a good moving picture is no simple matter. We want now to place a finger on one of the flaws, and certainly a very expensive flaw in manufacturing, which will explain why many of the independent manufacturers, although doing tolerably good business, fail to make money. We allude to the waste of raw stock.

One of the most successful of the licensed houses is successful because of the admirable system of economics followed in the factory. Every foot of film that goes through the camera, into the developing trough, is accounted for; every pound of developer, every reel tin nothing, in fact, is wasted or spoilt. A record of each foot is kept and the reasons of the failure noted. "Waste not, spoil not," is, roughly, the motto of this film manufacturing house, whose pictures, by the way, are noted for their regularity and uniformity of quality.

Without exaggeration we might say that our hearts have bled when we have seen the way in which waste has gone on in some of the newer manufacturing houses. Thousands of feet of film have been irretrievably spoilt. No attempt has been made to ascertain the cause with a view of preventing the recurrence of the effect. We have stood in the laboratory of a moving picture house and seen barrel after barrel of valuable chemicals treated with no more care than a barrel of coal or sand or granite. Not a single member of the dark-room staff seemed to care whether the chemicals were pure or not. Result: Dirty, spotty pictures and failure.

In the picture business, as in other departments of human industry, it is the little things which count. These economics, these avoidances of waste, are the little things of this business, which mark the difference between success and failure. We draw attention to this matter in the interests of the newer entrants into the moving picture field whose advertisements are appearing in our outer pages. This is the dead season of the year. There is not much doing. The sea serpent, the big gooseberry and other Summer phenomena are engaging public attention, so that, speaking generally, the moving picture business is at its lowest level. This is, then, should give the manufacturers the opportunity of taking stock of their position. They should overhaul and systematize their plants; they should see whether leakages prevail, in order to avoid waste. Generally speaking, like the exhibitor, they should put their houses in order so that they may take advantage of the opportunities that are before them in the ensuing Fall.

The Fight and its Aftermath.

The jealousy we feel against anything which tends to derogate the moving picture in the eyes of the great public is stirred to its depths as we read the newspaper controversy in regard to the exhibition of the alleged Jeffries-Johnson fight. With regard to the fight itself we have no opinion to offer. It is not our business; we are not fighting men, and we do not think that fighting men of the Jeffries-Johnson type contribute anything whatsoever towards human progress. On the other hand, we think they are mere instruments of greed and gambling in others, and that neither directly nor indirectly do they do anything to promote the cause of sport or athletics. Boxing—scientific boxing—such as many of us love to see, does help in the manly art of self-defense. But such unpleasant incidents where race antipathies are excited by the spectacle of a black athlete maltreating a former white athlete and exulting in the downfall of a beaten champion, such spectacles as these fill us and all right-minded men with regret.

We have nothing to do with prize fighting; but we have something to do with moving pictures, and we are concerned in the injury or possible injury done to the moving picture by its enforced use as the recording agency of a regretable spectacle. Even had Jeffries triumphed, "put the negro out of commission," as many thought or hoped he would do, we should still have been somewhat sceptical of the benefits that would have thereby accrued to the moving picture business as such. Of course, if Jeffries had won there would have been a chortle of triumph, and the picture would have been a success. But even so, it might have shown the negro in a condition of defeat, just as pathetic as that of Jeffries, consequently the same emotions would have been aroused in our minds. In other words, a feeling of regret that the moving picture should be used for the purpose of exploiting before millions of eyes such an uncivilizing affair as a knockout fight. We write "uncivilizing" advisedly, because we assert, without fear of contradiction, that in the fifty odd years history of the prize ring, no discoverable benefit to the community at large has arisen from this institution. Take them away from the arena as individuals, and neither Jeffries nor Johnson is worth a moment's consideration, mentally, morally, or ethically—they are just highly developed physical brutes. No more, no less.

Throughout the country there has been raised an objection to the exhibition of the pictures, and, frankly, we are not surprised that this sentiment has been aroused. We will admit that involved in the exploitation of these pictures are men who are known to have the best interests of the film business at heart, and that they should have credit rather than discredit for making the best of the pictures. They are level-headed business men and knew very well what was probable, namely, that in no conceivable circumstances would the fight, as such, be a spectacle to which the millions of children of the United States, nay, of the world, could be safely invited. Remember, reader, that it is the women and the children, as we have said over and over again, who are the main supporters of the moving picture theater. It is their nickels and dimes which support and enrich both licensed and independent manufacturers, renters and exhibitors. In the name of the prophet, can any man place his hand over his heart and say that the moving picture of the Jeffries-Johnson fight, as reported and recorded, is a spectacle to which he would recommend his wife and children? Decidedly not. Let us draw a distinction here between the prize fight and the boxing match. The former is a degrading, brutalizing exhibition. The knockout is more disgusting than even the gladiatorial contest in the old Roman arena. Then the man was killed and taken away. Here, his face is covered with blood, his cheeks, his eyes are puffed up, his teeth are knocked out, he falls in the ring or on the ropes a huddled mass of degraded humanity. What a spectacle! And it is this spectacle which the moving picture is asked to record

Far different is a moving picture of a boxing match. Here the science of the noble art is shown. Self-defense is one of the primal instincts of human nature, and you may acquire the necessary ability or qualification for exercising it by practising boxing—a totally different thing from a prize fight. We hope the reader will see the distinction that we are drawing. In depicting a scientific boxing match, we feel that the moving picture is not passing outside of its legitimate sphere, but when it comes to a knockout prize fight of the Jeffries-Johnson type, we feel ourselves obliged to protest in the most emphatic manner against such a use of the picture, on the simple grounds that these things ultimately disgust a ponderable section of the public, who are therefore prejudiced against the picture.

The Moving Picture World and the Periodicals.

The current number of the "Review of Reviews" has an article on the uses of the moving pictures in reproducing effects of growing plants—instancing roses, the development of the butterfly, etc. Our readers will remember that in our issue of July 16 we published an article entitled "The Living Picture Revealing Nature," showing that, consistent with our policy, we are ahead of even older publications; indeed, it seems possible that the "Review" may be "reviewing" us, as the language is very similar; if so, we are glad to have drawn attention to so useful and important as well as interesting subject ahead of our contemporaries. "Harper's Weekly" has a two-page profusely illustrated article on "Morals and the Moving Pictures," a subject we have dealt with in almost every phase to the present time. Our contemporary draws especial attention to the work of the National Board of Censorship and after recounting its origin and purpose proceeds to say: "It is fair to suppose that not one-third of those reading this page know the moving picture in its present stage of wonderful development." After describing the crude beginnings of motion picture machines, it continues: "Let us look for a brief period at this thing, consider its size and what it means, what its influence is on one-fifth of the minds of one-fifth of the people of this country and how its activities are made a means of educating and upbuilding these people by intelligent philanthropy, working hand-in-hand with every kind of self-interest." While in these well-deserved commendations we ourselves find nothing new, having touched upon every issue in these columns, we are glad to have "Harper's Weekly" write in this way, as doubtless many who do not read these pages will read their's, and that side of moving picture work the world should know is becoming more and more widespread.

In further review of the popularity of moving pictures, our contemporary shows how five million people daily visit exhibitions in this country and recount how gratifying it is that passing through dangers which in its early stages caused two or three great fires, it is now reasonably safe; and also how unscrupulous people first began to control its "shows," it is now passing into better hands and doing better work. These views, expressed by so intelligent a periodical as "Harper's," are worthy of acknowledgment here; we have, we trust, had some little part in helping forward to these conditions and are pleased to read another's commendations of the success achieved.

We cannot pass over "Harper's" good-natured railery of the editor of the "New York Journal," in which they call to account "Brother Brisbane" for calling attention to the "Journal's" publication of pictures of the great fight on pages 2 and 3 of July 9, while on another page there appears an article expressing strong disapproval of the moving pictures of the fight. They say: "Brother Brisbane makes us laugh; some of the pictures he prints with so much gusto in the paper that he edits are from the very films which supply the moving pictures, against which he protests." Only last week, in an article written for this paper, this same "Judas-like sincerity" was exposed; besides which, in the issue of July 23, under the title of "Imaginary Moving Pictures," we endeavored to show how this same newspaper needed the purifying influences of good moving pictures to refine its otherwise brutal conception of what kind of illustrations people required in their newspapers. These reviews are interesting, showing the growing power of the moving pictures everywhere, and when journalists and periodicals write so truthfully and commendatory they may depend upon valuable help from the MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

More Motographic Mendacity.

Lord Macaulay taught the world that history can be made very romantic reading—so romantic that its relationship to truth and exactitude is very remote indeed. It is tolerably safe to conjecture that three out of every five histories placed in the hands of school children are full of errors of fact, simply because the self-constituted historians have not gone to original documents for their facts. There are, let it be said, many histories of the War of the Revolution or American Independence. The greater number of these are highly imaginative bits of Macaulayism. We observe with pleasure, however, that the latest historian, Sir George Otto Trevelyan, has gone to State sources for his facts. So did the present British Ambassador, Mr. James Bryce, when he wrote his fine work, entitled, "The American Commonwealth."

In the World of the 30th ulto, we rebuked a self-constituted "historian" of the moving picture for distorting facts of history. We gave him the lie direct, when he came out with a statement that he showed the writer of this article paper negatives in October, 1908. He did nothing of the sort. He has never shown us a negative of any kind. We decline to believe that he is capable of taking a negative. We would not believe him on oath. Now with regard to the actual distortionof motographic history. We denied that "Historian" Saunders, or anybody else, had taken moving picture negatives on paper in a cinematographic camera in the year 1886. In reply to this we are confronted by two reproductions, a negative and a poistive, alleged to have been taken by W. Friese Greene in 1886. There is also a quotation from a letter by Mr. Friese Greene, substantiating or seeking to substantiate this alleged claim which may or may not be well founded.

Let us turn to the reputable historian of this subject, H. V. Hopwood's "Living Pictures," chapter three, page 64: "Not until the introduction of celluloid as a substitute for glass, was it possible to secure a long series of exposures on a suitable strip, and the commercial existence of this eminently suitable support began to bear fruit in the year 1888." Emerging from the domain of experiment, conjecture, private letter-writing, etc., etc., etc., let us next turn to page 93 of Hopwood's book, same chapter. "Up to this date, 1895, the Kinetoscope was the only instrument of a distinctly popular nature, and it may be safely affirmed that, whatever may have been done in the way of private experiment, no public exhibition of a projected living picture had been a popular success. With the advent of Messrs. Lumiere's Cinematographe, however, this desirable consummation was attained, and to them must be attributed the credit of stimulating public interest to such a pitch as to lay a firm foundation for the commercial future of projection apparatus, etc., etc., etc." The reader is referred to the book for further details.

Mr. Hopwood, as we have said in a former article, was an employee in the British Patent Office, and had unique opportunities for getting the facts of the history of the moving picture, as it was his business to consult first hand authorities. He may be absolutely relied upon. By the law of evidence, therefore, this claim of the making of moving picture negatives in 1886 must be disregarded.

We have nothing to do with Mr. Friese Greene in this matter. He is a personal friend of our own, and we would rather not go into details with regard to our reasons why we hardly think him entitled to the credit of being the "father of Kinematography," which some people so hastily assign to him.

Now comes the most extraordinary bit of history of all. We again quote from "Historian" Saunders' last bungling attempt. He says: "In addition to the above there appeared the following in the "British Journal of Photography" for December 6, 1895, when a gentleman and a personal friend of ours was in the editorial chair, a gentleman whose name is honored in every photographic circle in England. We refer to the late J. Traill Taylar, with whom we had many chats on the value of cinematography as a source for object lessons in the future."

This is the most impudent, the most amazing lie of all, and we can prove it to be so by reference to the "British Journal of Photography" itself, which any one of our readers can also consult in the Astor Library or any other public library. Mr. J. Traill Taylor, who was our journalistic godfather, died in Florida on November 8, 1895. We, who write this, wrote Taylor's biography in the British Journal; and in the issue of that paper for November 22, 1895, appears the announcement of the appointment of Mr. Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S., to the position of editor of the paper. The fact of the matter of this the December 6, 1895, article which "Historian" Saunders is quoting against the writer of this present article was actually written for him by T. C. Hepworth, printed by him (Bedding), edited by him and not by a dead man. Is it worth anybody's while paying any more attention to this bungling charlatan and perverter of the truth?

THOMAS BEDDING, F.R.P.S.

J. H. Hallberg, 30 East Twenty-third street, New York, has recently equipped the Clune Theater, Los Angeles, Cal., with two 40-50 ampere "Hallberg" direct current Economizers.

Natchez, Miss.—Mr. Goodman, of the Star Family Theater, is a devout reader of the Moving Picture World. He also believes in the local advertising of his show and sends a sample of a red, white and blue special poster which he had printed to advertise the Imp film, "In Wartime." Very effective it is.

The William Taylor Company, one of the oldest and most reliable drygoods retailers in Cleveland, have for some months, at stated intervals, held what they call "Children's Day." Their latest move is the purchase of a projecting machine so that films of motion pictures will be a feature of their program.

The Wordless Play and the Silent Drama.

At Bar Harbor, Me., next week, there is to occur a dramatic function, subsequently to be repeated in New York City, which we think will have such an enormous influence upon the future of the moving picture, that we specially desire to draw the attention of the moving picture public, and the public generally, to the function. This is the presentation before a special audience of the most cultured people in the United States of the wordless play, L'Enfant Prodigue, by Madame Pilar-Morin and her own specially trained company. For the benefit of those who are not acquainted with the history of this subject, we may say that L'Enfant Prodigue is a world-renowned play without words, of French origin. It is pure pantomime, accompanied by suitable music of a high class, nay, of the highest class possible. This play has been performed by the most renowned artists of the time all over the world, but it is some years since it was seen in the United States.

What has the wordless play to do with the silent drama? All, and everything. The one preceded the other. The silent drama, or the moving picture, as it is commonly called, is a graphic play without words, showing in pictorial form what human action does in histrionic and corporeal form. Both methods work along parallel lines. The wordless play is all action accompanied by suitable music. So is the silent drama or moving picture. There is only a difference in kind and not in essence between them. If we were to argue the matter out on strictly scientific lines, we should find that the actual difference between a silent play and a moving picture of equal quality was æsthetically slight. In other words, that the sensations and the emotions of the human mind, were as actively stirred by the moving picture as by the wordless play. For the edification of the reader, let us conclude the expository part of this article by reiterating that in the wordless play real people act without talking, whilst in the moving picture you look upon the photographs of voiceless performers.

As we have said over and over again, the history of the moving picture has yet to be written, but it may broadly be assumed that the wordless play has had a great influence upon the present improving position of the picture. Besides L'Enfant Prodigue you have La Poupee, Pierrot subjects, and others galore, which for years, until comparatively recently, supplied the appetite of the world for wordless plays. Pantomime, of course, is indigenous in France, Italy and other countries. By pantomime we mean wordless plays. At the moment such names as those of Dagmar Wiehe, Jane May, Pilar-Morin and others occur to us as having added lustre to this form of art. Again, there are the Ballets d'Action, popular in London, Paris, Rome and other European centers. These ballets are in a sense silent plays. Also there is the familiar Marionette show of Italy; this is also a wordless play. Here we have an interesting spectacle of the various forms of wordless plays popular for many, many years in European countries, unconsciously paving the way for the simplest of all forms of wordless plays, namely, the moving picture.

It is possible, nay, probable, that we shall now see a reversion to a previous state of things. The imminent revival of L'Enfant Prodigue under the highest auspices in the United States, proves conclusively, to our minds, that the moving picture has had, and is having, a tremendously educative effect upon the cultured classes of the country. Among these people there has sprung up a desire for pantomimic art of the highest order—a desire which is to be gratified by Pilar-Morin and her company. Clearly, then, the fine work of Pathe, Gaumont, Biograph, Selig, Essanay, Kalem and other companies has had its effect in an unlooked for direction. It has taught the valuable lesson that in dramatic entertainments, ACTION, ACTION, ACTION must exist all through. Your moving picture is futile without consecutive, continuous action and plenty of it. Your wordless play is all action—nothing but action. There is no room for the "stick" or the inefficient in the wordless play. They must all be actors and actresses of the highest possible ability, for they have to do without the commanding assistance of the human voice. Moreover, in the particular play under notice, L'Enfant Prodigue, suitable music accompanies the play, and the actors and actresses therefore have to act to, and with, the music.

We shall watch with sympathetic interest, the outcome of this revival of L'Enfant Prodigue at Bar Harbor and New York City. The play, we believe, is to be photographed, so that there will be an opportunity for the moving picture public to see a moving picture of a wordless play. Thereby, some valuable lessons in moving picture acting should be learnt. For it is trite to say that in the acting of the modern moving picture there is room for a very high uplift of the standard of quality, which we hope the performance of L'Enfant Prodigue will hasten.

THOMAS BEDDING, F.R.P.S.

The Lord's Prayer.—(Gaumont).

The series of pictures illustrating "The Lord's Prayer" are very good as far as they go, while the pictures in themselves may be thus classified as good, they are not satisfactory in that they are neither complete or explanatory.

As four of the most important divisions of the "Lord's Prayer" are lacking a serious break is the result; the prayer is in itself a united and relative series of prayers from which a break or curtailment is not only a loss, but an error which should be especially avoided.

This particular series is described as allegorical, and while all praise is due to the excellence of each subject both in thought and execution, they are too ambiguous and too independent of each other to sufficiently fill the purpose for which they are designed. Probably with the addition of the missing parts and some reference to the allegorical idea in the mind of the originator this can be made an interesting subject; because of the profound thought of the "Prayer," and of the opportunity for the most imaginative conception of that which stimulates the noblest emotions possible in the human soul a development of this series will be valuable.

W. H. J.

Asbury Park, N. J.—The moving picture theaters in the beautiful seaside resort of Monmouth County are a great success this season. Several new houses have opened, among them are the Crystal Theater which is handsomely decorated with mirrors. It is operated by Ernest Schnitzler, the amusement promoter. Its seating capacity is 600. The World of Motion is operated by Mr. E. Ehrickson; seats 500 people and is doing a fine ticket office business. The American is a beautiful house in which to spend an hour's time. Mr. Dawson, the manager of the house, is pleased with the results. The Star Theater, owned by Mr. J. Williams, is doing as well as the above. Also the B. & S. Amusement Company, which does a greater business in the Fall than at the present time. The Perkin Theater, on the west side of the city, is a theater for colored people and Mr. Williams, the owner, smiles at the crowds as they pass up to the ticket office. Mayor Appleby has instructed all the exhibitors that no [illegible] pictures of any kind can be shown.

THOS. P. BIBLE.

Antiseptic Show Business.

By H. F. Hermsen.

In my younger days I shocked the community in which I lived by going away with a circus. Within thirty days from the day I "joined out" I had risen from the bottom to the top. From trap drummer in the band I was that quickly promoted to the business staff. They made me the press agent and for many years I traveled the country writing and illustrating stories of the greatest show on earth, which always happened to be the one I was connected with at the time.

The winter months I usually spent at home, and on Sundays I would sometimes drop in at the church where formerly I had been a shining example. I soon became aware that I was somewhat persona non grata, on account of having been with a circus, so I did not attend very much after that.

Now and then, some few of the church members whom I knew better than others would stop and quiz me all about circus life. Some of them appeared to believe me when I explained that I was still leading the simple life, but it seemed hard for any of them to reconcile the fact that a man can follow the circus life and lead the simple life at one and the same time.

Their talk constantly drifted back to actors and actresses. The old blind prejudice kept cropping out and they would ask me if I didn't think it was wrong to be mingling with people of such low moral standing, who were always getting divorces or running away with other peoples' wives or husbands, or doing something else that made their very presence contaminating.

I tried in vain to make them understand that there are many blameless wives and mothers under the tents, but they all suffer for the acts of the few. Besides, I urged that my business was of such a nature that gave me little time to mingle with performers, as I was constantly meeting and in the company of editors, who ought to be considered a very respectable class of men, and that it was sometimes my duty to entertain mayors of cities and governers of states.

One of the elders stopped me one day and asked how I was doing. I explained at length describing my work with real enthusiasm. He listened silently and when I had finished he said: "Yes, but what about your soul?" I told him my soul was all right and walked away, considerably miffed, and resolved to explain no more.

About that time the Spanish-American war had ended and our boys in blue were coming home. One of our church boys had been away to the Philippines. Now every man knows that there is nothing in the world more demoralizing than armies. This young man had been away with a motly mob of mixed men called a regiment, composed largely, no doubt, of teamsters, hucksters, coalheavers and ne'er-do-wells of all kinds. He had done no fighting, but had spent many months in mixed company, where all he could do was to listen to their stories of perversion and the laying bare of physical and mental sores, ad infinitum, ad nauseum.

Nevertheless, when he returned he was hailed as a hero. He attended church on his first Sunday night at home, arrayed in full and brilliant uniform, and all eyes were upon him. It was the first time I had ever heard the minister go out of his "lines" to swell up any member of the congregation. He made a pretty speech about how glad we all were to have one of the sheep back in the fold, and I had to sit and listen to this boost. Here was a young man who had spent a couple of years in the company of roustabouts being praised as a hero, while I, [illegible] had been working hard, making an honest living and meeting the most respectable of gentlemen, had returned in disgrace. I was outcast again.

Not long afterward, the same congregation was torn asunder by one of the most [illegible] scandals ever known possible to imagine. It came with all the trimmings, involving church members exclusively, including one suicide, one case of insanity, which page in the metropolitan press with illustrations, and the outcome, unable to bear the brunt of it, got "in bad" himself. It beat any circus scandal I ever heard of, and I said to myself, "If that's religion, excuse me," so I quit the church.

So much for circus, and so much for church. In the foregoing I merely wish to call attention to the inconsistent prejudice of the church against the showman, whom they always treat as though he were afflicted with some contagious disease, while the church may be reeking itself. We will now turn to what I call "antiseptic" show business, meaning nothing more nor less than Moving Pictures.

Soon after I quit the road I opened my Moving Picture emporium near to where I have lived so long. The crowds began coming, and I was soon looked upon as a very promising young business man. My credit as a Moving Picture man was A1, where as a plain showman it was a case of C. O. D. every time. I was invited to join the "Business Men's League," and was put on all sorts of committees for neighborhood improvement; removing telegraph poles, ugly signs, better mail and trolley service, etc. I was considered the leading authority on the possibilities and probabilities of lighting a prominent thoroughfare with flaming arcs, simply because I had two of them hanging in front of my place.

Members of the old congregation came in to renew acquaintance and pat me on the back, and I began to receive the weekly church notices (and envelopes) once more. The members stopped and quizzed me as of yore, but this time there were no actors or actresses to explain away. They were not afraid of me because my business was "antiseptic."

From being an obscure mortal, home only a couple of months in the year, a stranger in my own town, I became the most widely known individual in ten thousand. The children within a radius of a mile called my by name as I passed on my way, and I was always busy bowing to the right and left.

Summer before last a big circus came to town, and I went out to the lot to meet some of my old circus friends. They had all heard about me and my place, and asked many questions and much advice on the subject. "I'm done with you actors folks," I laughed, "you got me in bad. I'm a showman still, but not your kind; I've got all my actors right here in this little bag, and they never give me any trouble. They never get drunk and are always willing to work and do an extra turn if necessary. They never "beef" for more salary and they never fight among themselves. And listen, they never hold hands nor get divorces nor elope with other folks' wives and husbands, because they're antiseptic, boys, they're antiseptic!"

A series of Sales Company meetings were held this week, arranging for the distribution of the stock to the newer recruits and still further ratifying and establishing a harmonious working agreement between the trade.

CHARLES BAUMANN GOES WEST.

By the time this issue of The Moving Picture World is in the hands of its readers Mr. Charles Baumann, the president of the New York Motion Picture Company, will be on his way West for a double object: First, that of paying a prolonged visit of inspection to the Los Angeles plant of the company; second, that of endeavoring to further strengthen the position of the Independent exchanges with regard to the routine of profitably handling Independent films. Before Mr. Baumann left New York we had an opportunity of talking with him in the handsome new offices of the New York Motion Picture Company, Lincoln Building, 1 Union Square. The company is to be congratulated upon possessing such a very elegant suite of rooms, which Mr. Baumann says will include the entire floor by this time next year. We hope it will.

We were interested to meet Mr. H. J. Streychmans, installed as press agent of the company, and to learn that Miss Kenney, so well and favorably known in the trade, has been appointed secretary of the company.

Mr. Baumann pleased us by talking quality of picture. A little later in the year we shall fully describe and illustrate the Coney Island plant of the famous, or shall we say, to be famous?—Reliance films. For the Reliance pictures are to be the comedy end of the New York Motion Picture Company's productions. They are to be, in fact, the ne plus ultra of modern moving picture making. In other words, they are to possess the very acme of good quality and to equal, if not excel, the best American pictures at present on the market. This is Mr. Baumann's determination, backed up by capital, talent and selling ability. We applaud him for it.

The Western plant will go on as hitherto; that is to say, it will continue to produce Western subjects, or possibly, to be more accurate, subjects in which Western themes play an important part. It is unquestionably the case that the public demands a certain proportion of these Western themes. We had an idea, backed up by evidence offered us, that the public was showing some little fatigue in this matter. Perhaps, however, this is only temporary. Perhaps, too,—or should we say, probably?—there will always be a perceptible demand for these cowboy, ranch life, Indian subjects, which, after all, are racy of the soil; that is to say, typically American, or, in other words, typical of certain distinct phases of American life.

Asked as to his feeling with regard to business in the coming Fall, Mr. Baumann was emphatically of the opinion that it promises to be exceptionally good. Indeed, according to him, to paraphrase the heading of an article which we wrote some time ago, the exhibitor is to have "a very golden time, indeed." So, of course, will the manufacturer and, we hope, Mr. Independent Exchange. We have a special hope in regard to the latter, for it cannot be said that so far he has figured very profitably in the business.

We had a little talk with Mr. Baumann in reference to the Sales Company, of which he is an officer. Rumor had gone to the effect that new Independent manufacturers found it difficult to get into this company. Mr. Baumann pointed out that there was no difficulty at all, and certainly no disposition, to exclude anybody who had an ipso facto right to be in the company—that is, of manufacturing Independent films. All that is necessary for the Independent manufacturers to do to secure recognition at the hands of the Sales Company is to make pictures of such good quality that exhibitors and exchanges call for them.

Mr. Baumann has our best wishes for a pleasant and successful month out West.

MOSES AND AARON.

The above is a photograph of Mr. C. O. Baumann and Thomas D. Cochrane, whom "T. B." facetiously dubbed the Moses and Aaron of the Sales Company. Charlie, as we have said, is on his way to California. Tom, the hard-working manager of the "Imp" destinies, is spending a much needed and well-earned vacation somewhere in the White Mountains. No one knows his address but his private secretary, the demure Miss O'Keefe, and she is faithful to her pledge of secrecy. The photograph was taken by a World representative just as "Moses and Aaron" were starting on a joy ride around the Falls to celebrate their successful coalition of the Independent forces at the recent Niagara Falls convention.

CHARLES FARRELL—A BUFFALO LIVE WIRE.

"Hello, Farrell."

"Hello, Moving Picture World."

"So you are the promoter that is back of all these show houses," a Moving Picture World reporter said to a thick-set, square-jawed man who has the Rooseveltian cast of countenance and the same energetic manner.

"Yes, I am the 'wise guy,' as you say. On January 4 I promoted the 'Sylvia' and since then have promoted the 'Cazenovia, 'Palace,' 'Unique,' 'Bailey' and 'Owl' theaters, with five more now under construction. Have you any fellow down your way with such a record? For some reason or other all these houses are using Independent stuff, with the exception of one. I have installed Motiographs in all but one and will use no other machine in any house I promote. I also use exclusively the 'Lang' rewind.

"I have advised all my interested people to subscribe for your most valuable magazine. I consider that no one in the moving picture business has a complete equipment without your magazine. I have seen many articles in same that were worth ten times the subscription price to any exhibitor; besides, he knows at all times what's doing in the picture proposition.

"I am at your service any time for information and wish you all kinds of success."

Exchange men should appreciate the consideration shown by the Dramagraph Company in withholding their releases until the Summer is over. They deserve to get a large support, when they do release, not only for the above reason but on the excellent quality of their product.

GREAT INEREST IN ESSANAY WORD CONTEST.

The Essanay Company's "new name" contest, in which they offer a prize of $100 for a new name for "moving picture show," has aroused no little interest among the exhibitors, and hundreds of answers are being received by the Essanay Contest Editor, who is confident that the contest will be a success. Letters to the Essanay Company from exhibitors all over the country voice a hearty endorsement of the Essanay's plan and suggest that the theaters should be permitted to advertise the terms of the contest to their patrons.

The Smith Brothers, Menonimee, Wis., write: "We understand you are running a contest for a new name for the picture houses, and we think it a fine plan. Is the contest open to picture patrons and would there be any objections if we advertised in the local papers to the effect: 'Any patron of the Grand Theater can enter the contest for the $100 word as given by the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company. For further information call at the box-office, etc.' In this way we would create an interest in the contest and it would make a fine ad. for us."

Another exhibitor in Jersey City, N. J., has offered $100 for a new name for moving picture shows to the patrons of three Jersey City theaters. He proposes to advertise in all the local papers, to posterize his lobby, and to make announcements on his screen. He has requested the Essanay Company to be the judge of the contest.

"We will certainly find a suitable name from the hundreds of really excellent suggestions we are receiving," said the Essanay Contest Editor. "It is evident that the majority have caught the right idea and their contributions bear evidence of thoughtful study and earnest endeavor. Some of them define their words and show the reasons for their invention. One contributor submits the following: 'Pantograph': A definition name covering the musical and pictorial and dramatic features of the five-cent theater. Pan, Greek god of pastoral music. Pan, Greek root word of pantomime, panorama, etc. Graph, already adopted by the film profession and understood by the public.'"

For those who are not informed of the terms of the contest here they are in brief:

One hundred dollars are offered for a new name for "moving picture show," "five-cent theater," or "nickelodeon."

The contest is open to all and will close September 1, when the judges will examine the contributions and make their selections.

Write the name you choose on the back of envelope, enclose in the envelope your name and address

Contributions should be addressed to Contest Editor, Essanay Film Mfg. Co., 435 North Clark street, Chicago.

"THE VOW, OR JEPHTHAH'S DAUGHTER" (Gaumont).

The ministers of the Gospel have no more excuse to keep the moving pictures out of their churches, as the manufacturers are working very hard to bring out subjects suitable for church work.

Mr. Geo. Kleine, who has lately issued a very interesting catalogue of the greatest collection known of educational films, is pushing his foreign manufacturers to produce more and more of the Biblical subjects.

"The Vow, or Jephthah's Daughter," a new Gaumont production to be released in August, is another masterpiece. Jephthah, the ninth judge of the Israelites, a natural son of Gilead, of the tribe of Manasseh, was expelled from his home by his brothers, at the death of his father, on account of his illegitimate birth. He withdrew to the land of Tob, where he became the chief of a band of brigands. Later on, when the Israelites resolved to oppose the Ammonites, they invited Jephthah to become their commander. He accepted the invitation on condition that he should remain their ruler if he defeated the Ammonites. When setting forth against the enemy, Jephthah, who perhaps feared that the Lord would not favor him on account of his past, made a solemn vow to the Lord that if he returned victorious he would offer up for a burnt offering whatsoever first "came forth from the doors of his house" to meet him. When Jephthah's daughter, an only child, heard of her father's victory and return she rushed to meet him and was the first person to "come forth from Jephthah's house."

"BEFORE THE TEMPLE OF SACRIFICE."
Scene from "The Vow," or Jephthah's Daughter (Gaumont).

This story is rendered in the very best manner and is a new addition to the collection of historical productions and a worthy successor to "Judith and Holophernes," "Esther," "Fall of Babylon," etc., etc. The acting is irreproachable, every move and expression is as true as if we had witnessed the life story of Jephthah some 1,100 years B. C.

The details are nursed with the greatest care and the settings are of this opulent richness of old times. The photography is of a rare beauty, while the coloring is rich in tints and greatly adds to the splendor of the production. In other words it is a perfect oil painting, and while the eye is feasting on the beauty of the scenes, the mind seems to be diverted from the sadness of the subject.

The morbid class, always looking for something sensational to arouse their senses, will perhaps turn to "Jephthah's Daughter" in the hope of seeing the beautiful girl burned as an offering. They will be sadly disappointed, as the producers stop at the door of the sacrifice. We see the girl surrender and enter the place where she is to be sacrificed and no more. Well, we do not ask for more, as a human sacrifice would destroy the good impression left by such a master production.

HOW ONE CONCERN SELECTS PICTURE BACKGROUNDS.

Being an Account of an Involuntary Peep Behind the Scenes

By J. P. Chalmers.

Dear reader, have you ever been kidnapped?

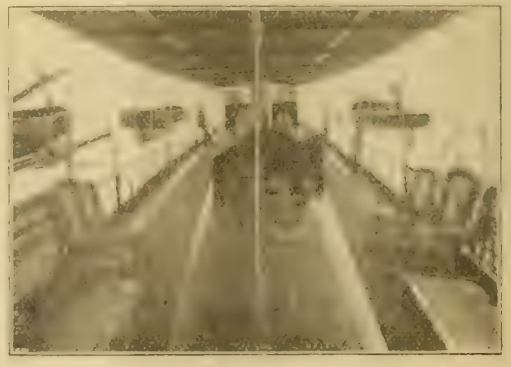
I have been.

The morning was particularly unpleasant. Yet I was returned to twenty-four hours with agony lest this [illegible] Worldtrial to reach you with its accustomed regularity. Not to speak of many hair-raising experiences while my tormentors plotted in devising and perpetrating upon my helpless body.

It all happened thus. On Wednesday evening I journeyed to the City of Fun—Dreamland, Coney Island, to be exact—to witness the excellent presentation of the Jeffries and Johnson pictures on a 40-foot screen. Whom should I meet there but "Pop" Rock and Mr. O'Day, the managers of the J. & J. Company, and also Mr. J. Stuart Blackton, of the Vitagraph Company, with a party of friends.

After the show was over, I was invited by Mr. Blackton to visit on board his new yacht, the "Paula," which was anchored nearby. Now I had heard much about the twin-sister yachts built by the Electric Launch Company, of Bayonne, for Messrs. A. E. Smith and Mr. Blackton, of the Vitagraph Company, and I had seen upon the screen how well the two vessels had already been utilized in certain life portrayals, so I was glad of the opportunity to inspect one of these expensive "props."

Hanging to the davits is the "Vita," a twenty-five knot motor boat.



The sparsity of poops and deckhouses imparts a very trim appearance.

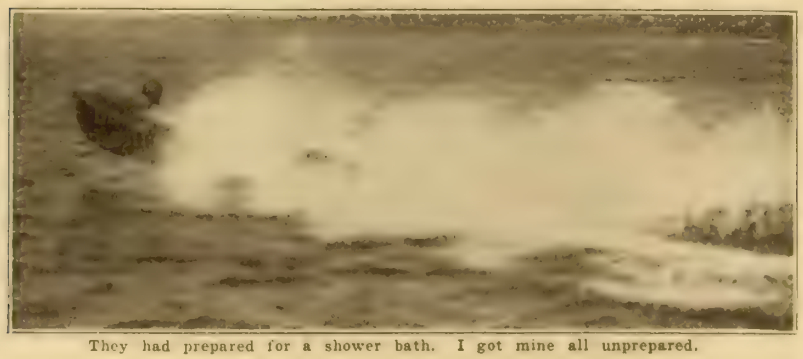
A few years ago I undertook to photograph a large number of yachts for a publication in that line; therefore I have been on quite a few, and some elaborate ones, too; but on none whose arrangement and equipment appealed to me more than did that of the "Paula." She and her sister boat were built from plans furnished by Messrs. Smith and Blackton. Designed for business as well as pleasure, spacious deck room was their aim, and the sparsity of poops and deckhouses imparts a very trim appearance to the vessels. Hanging to the davits of the "Paula," besides the usual dingy and power tender, is the "Vita," a twenty-foot eight-cylinder motor boat capable of a speed of twenty-five knots an hour. Smith has one also. (Wonderful the "props" that are required by film producers nowadays.)

On board the "Paula" I was introduced to a distinguished appearing German, Prof. Lucas D'Aix, said to be professor of mathematics, arts and all the ologies, but who at that particular moment was discussing the merits of a certain [illegible] cooper of American brew. Seated beside him was J. Alex. Leggett, introduced as the Vitagraph advance agent. What the duties of that position were I did not then inquire, but I was to learn later.

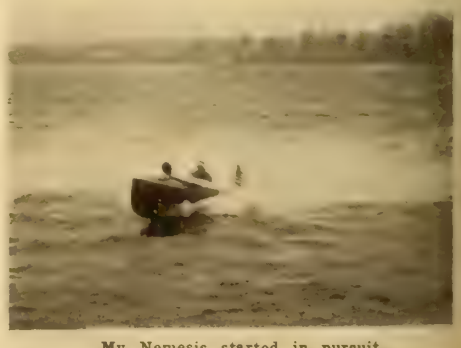
We swapped yarns and talked shop until I intimated that I had an engagement with Morpheus in a nearby city. I was dryly informed that there was no means of communication with land before morning and advised to turn in, which I did in one of the luxurious bedrooms on the "Paula." Towards seven o'clock in the morning I was awakened by the throbbing of the engines and peering out of a porthole saw the shores of Manhattan fading away in the distance. Hastily dressing, I rushed "upstairs" and sought out my three companions of the previous evening, who were holding suspicious conversation on the "front stoop" of the floating mansion. I demanded to be put ashore, as I had a pressing engagement with my printer. Not a word. I bewailed the fact that if I were not put ashore there would be no Moving Picture World issued this week. No one seemed to hear my voice. The morning mists shut out the sight of land. I became desperate. D'Aix began to tell what he thought was a funny story in his broken English. Blackton and Leggett joked with him in equally horrible German. I interected a wild appeal and Blackton was finally gracious enough to say to me: "Be calm; breakfast will be served in a few minutes!" "Yah, yah, das ist so," said D'Aix.

At the breakfast table my tormentors had not recovered the use of their mother tongue, but I understood enough of their lingo to see through their game. Last week the World editorially suggested that moving picture manufacturers get more correct local color in their productions and advised their sending out scouts for suitable scenes for moving picture backgrounds. It developed that this has long been the practice of the Vitagraph Company and their advance agent had felt aggrieved that their enterprise had not been recorded. The present party was now bent on one of these scouting expeditions and he had decided to give me an ocular demonstration of that fact, willy nilly.

So I joined in the laugh at my own expense and tried to forget where duty called, especially as the only modern convenience not to be found on the "Paula" is a wireless station.



They had prepared for a shower bath. I got mine all unprepared.



My Nemesis started in pursuit.

The commotion which the "Vita" makes in the water.

So I settled down to watch mine host at his work and watch out myself for the first avenue of escape.

Seated in comfortable wicker chairs on the "verandah" of a swiftly moving vessel is a rather unusual place for the preparation of settings for moving pictures. Yet there they were at it—each with a handful of "scenarios" and on a chart before them a number of pieces of material which our German learned friend persisted in calling "stones," but which I have heard called "chips."

As the noonday sun dispelled the fog, the serrated coast line of the north shore of Long Island hove in sight. ("Hove," I believe, is a nautical term. I learned a few on my enforced voyage.) The background scouts dropped anchor and lowered the speed boat to inspect a few nooks that looked good to them. I went along, thinking here was my chance of escape. Because they had dressed in bathing attire, I guessed that they intended having a swim on one of the inviting sandy beaches. I guessed wrong. They had prepared for a shower bath. I got mine all unprepared. Take a glance at the accompanying snapshot showing the commotion which the "Vita" makes in the water. It will explain why my tormentors wore a continuous grin like the now famous Johnson smile.

Once on shore, I hastened to the only house in sight.

"Where is the nearest railroad station?"

"Six or seven miles over the hill."

"Is there any conveyance?"

"None, but you can find it if you go thus—and thus—and thus."

"Where can I telegraph?"

"At the station."

I threw up my hands and rejoined the scouts. Back to the "Paula," and luncheon served, we again started on the quest for backgrounds. We scooted around Manhasset Bay, which is to be the stamping ground of a company of Vitagraph actors for a week or more. There and in other spots in the most varied and picturesque scenery to be found on Long Island a number of pretentious life portrayals are to be produced. In these the yachts and their tenders will figure conspicuously. I heard Mr. Blackton dicker with the owner of a magnificent houseboat, or rather floating hotel, which was said to have cost $40,000 to build. Whether Mr. Blackton wanted this in which to house the Vitagraph actors, or merely to be used as a "prop," I am not prepared to say, but $500 a month rental seemed to be satisfactory to both parties. We skirted around the cliffs of High Point and into lovely Huntington Harbor. Here the "Paula" again dropped anchor and the "Vita" was used in the scouting expedition among the inlets and bays. For sun-dry reasons I remained on the "Paula." I jumped at the first opportunity while the "Vita" carroomed off on one of those wild flights to bribe one of the crew to row me ashore. My Nemesis at the wheel of the "Vita" saw the move, and, hidden in a cloud of spray, started in pursuit; but a passing sailboat (bless her!) got in the way and I landed and made a dash for an automobile stage.

"Get me to the station in time for the first train," I panted, as I dropped into the seat, and, as the car darted forward, I looked back and gave the laugh and the slip to my grinning tormentors. The last I heard was Leggett's taunt: "So you think manufacturers should send out scouting parties for backgrounds, do you?"

Do I think so? They may erect Jersey scenery or any other scenery in their backyards or in their studios to doomsday, for all I care, before I again put in so strenuous a day!

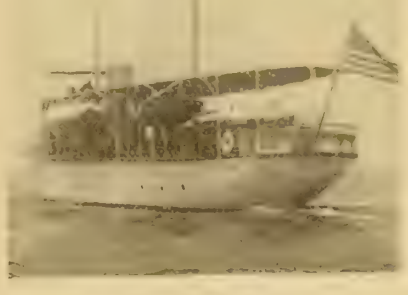
I cheerfully parted with the exorbitant fee which the chauffeur demanded for whirling me to the station, and on the fifty-mile journey homeward thought I would tell the World readers just why the paper was late in going to press this week.

A GRATIFYING CONDITION.

The Motiograph makers have just been obliged to install further expensive machinery to keep pace with their orders, and report inability at this time to keep machines ahead for stock, being able only to supply current demands promptly. They say that in spite of the approaching dull season, their business for three months, ending June 1, was over 50 per cent. larger than for the preceding three months.

It is pleasing to observe such activity in this field, especially at this season of the year, and particularly on the part of a concern so widely noted for its square dealing, but if we were inclined to be narrow-minded, we might regret a little of this activity because a firm which is selling to its full capacity does not find such urgent need to patronize the advertising columns of the papers as if business were slack; however, we look to see the Enterprise people continue their advertising and increase their capacity as rapidly as may be necessary to care for new business.

Mr. Blackton's twin-screw yacht "Paula."



Stern view of "Paula."

The moving picture machine operators in Greater New York who have not come within the requirements of the law received a severe jolt during the week just closed and a large number of operators who have been grinding a living out of the machines for several years are, or will be very soon, compelled to seek another means of livelihood. The new State law applying to operators went into effect on August 1, and the electrical branch of the Department of Water, Gas and Electricity is enforcing it rigidly and without delicacy or favor. It is estimated that there are about forty per cent. less operators running machines than were at work prior to the last week in July.

From the surprise and concern manifested by the operators it is evident that a comparatively small percentage anticipated such decisive action by the electrical board as has been taken. Many of them confess that they confidently believed the new law would go upon the shelf as a matter of form. The first blow was struck during the early part of the last week of July, when scores of operators received written notices that they had failed to pass the examination for the 1910 cards and were invited to call at the bureau without delay. All operators were allowed to retain their jobs until Monday, August 1, when the fiscal year of 1910 opened and commencing with which date none only operators holding 1910 cards are qualified.

Those who failed in the 1910 examination are to be given another chance, and as there are not sufficient licensed operators to fill all the jobs that should be filled, the electrical department has given the assurance that twenty-five applicants will be examined each day, even if it shall become necessary to employ additional examiners for the occasion. The examinations will in all probability commence next week.

One provision in the new law will cut down the number of operators for some time. It requires that the applicant must be a citizen of the United States of America. A surprising number find this an insurmountable bar. Unfortunately it operates against some very good men who have been operating for several years, but the authorities have no alternative. The law cannot be enforced against some and allowed to remain inoperative against others. I happened to be in the electrical department when four men who asked for reexamination were told that it could do them no good in view of their admission that they were not citizens.

Many operators will be disqualified for other reasons. There has been considerable leniency on the part of the examiners in the past when inquiring the ages of applicants, and many secured cards in former years by making misrepresentations on that score. It is understood that affidavits will not suffice. Applicants who heretofore failed in examinations under one name, but subsequently passed under an assumed name, are to be closely watched, and the board will in some cases go as far as requiring certified copies of the Bureau of Vital Statistics records to remove doubts.

The new law also applies to exhibitors, so that operators under the ban cannot depend upon the ingenuity of their employers to help them get by the law or the board's rules. The penalty fixed for exhibitors who allow unlicensed operators to run their shows is $100 fine or 30 days' imprisonment, or both. No exhibitor will invite any of these penalties.

A strict watch is to be kept upon all picture places by inspectors of the electrical board, and another watch is to be kept by inspectors from the Mayor's office. I get it from semi-official sources that the latter inspectors will ask the operators visited, questions similar to these, especially if there is anything wrong with their cards or the booths in which they are working, or if the inspectors have had their suspicions aroused: "Are you a citizen?" "When did you pass examination?" "When did an inspector last call upon you?" "Did you pay anything, directly or indirectly, for your card?" "If so, how much?" With the conditions now in operation it seems such questions will be superfluous, but I am told that they may sometimes reveal misrepresentation or imposition.

As I glean the facts, the present rigid policy towards the operators had its inception in complaints that many qualified men who would not resort to duplicity to overcome some technicality, found themselves deprived of a license, when others, practically unqualified, but through misrepresentations and clever schemes passed the examinations and secured cards. Many ugly stories have been in circulation regarding the posting of applicants on examinations and other tricks, and some of them are to the effect that this accounts for some applicants successfully passing an examination under an assumed name after having failed under their own name.

The overcrowding of the ranks of operators has been a source of complaint for a long time on the part of the older and more experienced men, who gradually saw the scale of wages descend and their places taken by youths who were content to take them at much lower wages than the others had been receiving for some time. The policy of the electrical department certainly made these complainants feel good during the past week. A man who succeeded in getting operators for exhibitors who had been deprived of their men, told me that in several cases the exhibitors gladly agreed to pay an increased scale to get a qualified and competent man, and in some instances twenty-five dollars per week was readily conceded.

During the past few days I have heard many complaints that the provision of the law depriving a man of filling a position as a moving picture machine operator because he is not a citizen, is illegal, or, rather, unconstitutional. Others say this question was gone into thoroughly before the law was passed. It would take a long legal battle to decide the point, so long that, even if declared unconstitutional, many of the operators now affected by it would have secured other means of employment and their interest in the outcome would be lost.

The question of constitutionality in this case I believe is a poor straw to grasp at. Before the courts could definitely settle it, anyone so disposed could become a citizen and qualify himself for the examinations. If it is not the shortest route to a solution of the situation, it is certainly the most effective and commendable. A man born in this country will also find it hard to explain why he has not put within his reach the advantages and assumed the duties of citizenship, and a man coming from another land who is likewise dilatory finds few sympathizers when he is confronted with the situation so many operators are now meeting. The question of citizenship is as formidable, if not more so, than Roosevelt's race suicide contention. A country like the United States certainly needs population. It also needs citizens. It must also be remembered that operators are more dispensable than citizens, without which the present form of government could have no existence.

I feel sorry for a great many of the operators who have been shut out. I know them to be good fellows and good operators. Unfortunately they have not posted themselves as to modern requirements. In many instances this may have applied to the technical phase of the situation, but nevertheless the examining board has a right to frame its rules as to qualifications and it cannot be blamed if its examinations are within its jurisdiction.

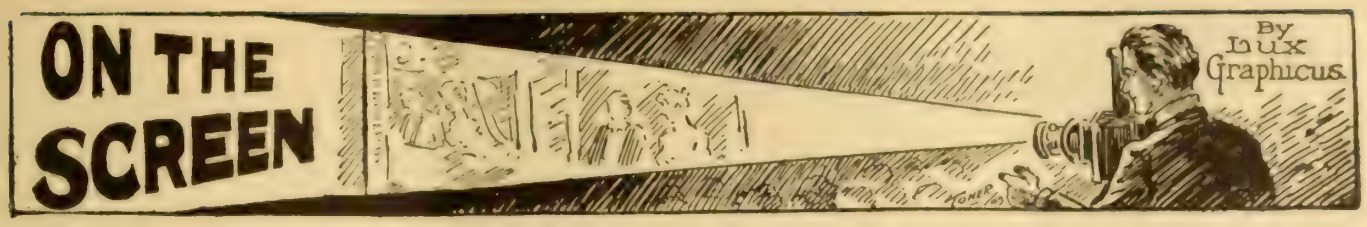
I see a committee called upon Governor Hughes at Albany, N. Y., to have him intercede in the Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures matter. He was asked to help stop the exhibition of the pictures. The Governor very philosophically asked the committee why it did not appeal to the laws and was told that Mayor Gaynor had been appealed to but he could not find any law applicable to the case. "Well," said the Governor, "the ex-Judge knows the laws pretty well." This satisfies me that Governor Hughes has little hope of digging up a law and that if he cannot find one he will not make a fool of himself.



Anthony Trollope, the novelist, made money at the game by working on his books just like a mechanic. He plugged away at them without waiting for inspiration, environment inclination, which so many modern writers seem to think essential for success in the work. One of the most interesting of his books was called "An Editor's Tales." Trollope, besides being a novelist, was an editor, and, in that capacity, was brought into contact with some of the tragic aspects of life. Being an editor is not all beer and skittles. I know. I have been an editor about ten times during my short life and possibly shall die one. Nous verrons. "We shall see."

Editors are called on to do many things of which the public wot not. They are the guides, counsellors, friends of many of their readers, personally as well as through the pages of their papers. I am driven into this groove of reflection by the receipt of a letter from a disappointed scenario writer, who says nice things of me and to me, and wants me to read his rejected scenarios and tell him why they are rejected. The scenarios are good suis generis, that is, of their kind. They call for little or no criticism except that the subjects are as old as the hills. They are well written, good stories, but the same stories have been well written before and probably will be again.

There is a man at present in this country in a field contiguous to my own. Years ago in London when I was working as an editor, this man called upon me with an article. This article was on a photographic subject: the intensification of negatives by means of bichloride of mercury, which every photographer knows to be a process many, many years old. There was absolutely nothing novel in this man's method of mercurial intensification as described. The result was that I had verbally to say: "Declined with thanks." I therefore made an enemy of this man for life.

Why are so many scenarios rejected? Simply that they deal with hackneyed themes—themes that have been treated of, time after time, before. Editors of newspapers and magazines, editors of scenarios and the like, are usually men of experience, tolerably well read, and therefore competent to detect freshness and originality of theme in work submitted to them; able to reject the obviously old, imitative and otherwise unsuitable. A scenario, therefore, may be rejected on many, many grounds. Under the generic head of "unsuitability" there may be many drawbacks to its acceptance. From what I know of the state of the market, producers are on the lookout for the really novel in the way of scenarios. That they cannot get them in the ordinary way of business is, or seems to me, evidenced by the fact that they are advertising for them. The demand, therefore, exceeds the supply.

My correspondent asked me to criticise his scenarios. Criticism of this kind is of very little use. I have met thousands and thousands of literary aspirants. I have criticised hundreds of stories and other literary productions. I have seldom found that any good resulted from criticisms. As has been said, Poeta nascitur, non fit. "Poets are born, not made." Or, to amplify this axiom, every scenario or novel writer, or newspaper man, is a naturally, not artificially, prepared product.

I am not going so far as to say that criticism of scenarios is always valueless. I think, generally, however, it is. My advice to my correspondent or to anybody else who wishes to make money at the game, is to plug away until he is lucky enough to get one of his plots accepted. This one seems to have the technique of his work at hand. All he lacks is inspiration, which, roughly put, is novelty of subject, or suitability for treatment on the moving picture stage. Did I not tell the reader a few weeks ago that a play which I wrote once was so cut and licked into shape by the producer that it bore little or no resemblance to its original self. Yet if I had known the technique of the subject as I know it now, I might have saved myself and the producer a lot of time and trouble. The "how" of a subject which you are studying sometimes comes to you all of a sudden, and may come at a moment when it looks, oh! so distant. The "how" of scenario writing for the moving picture stage has clearly not come to many would-be aspirants. That is why there are so many failures.

I will try to give the ambitious scenario writer some idea of what I mean by originality of subject and treatment. A man died the other day who had originality to perfection. This was O. Henry, whose short stories were quickly snapped up by the magazines. He departed from the conventional in character, plot, style, and treatment.

Then there was a gifted woman, Myra Kelly, who died recently of consumption abroad. She, too, was a successful short story writer. She drew her inspiration, subjects, and characters from the lower East Side of New York City. She had clear-cut types; she studied in the schools, for she was a teacher; and so her work came to be looked upon by magazine editors and others as distinctive, original, and fresh.

Perhaps this hint may be of service to the would-be scenario writer. There is another woman whose works I am constantly reading in the magazines: Mary Roberts Rinehart, a noted dramatist, by the way. Then, R. W. Chambers generally has something fresh to write about. The editorial page of the "New York Evening World" day by day has bright, fresh humor, striking situations, dramatic action, in short-story form. Irvin Cobb, Clarence Cullen and others are all bright, fresh, original, breezy writers. The scenario writer should endeavor to imitate these people in his view of things. Another thing: Go to the moving picture theater, study what the people like, why they like it, then go home and write something out of your own knowledge, experience and observation. This is the advice of Sir Charles Wyndham, Sir John Hare, Belasco and others. Feel what you write, feel the action. There is not much in the invention of a plot, there is much in its method of treatment. It is the feeling of the author expressed in the action that is, after all, one of the main evidences of success. Given one set of circumstances to half a dozen writers, there would be half a dozen methods of treating those circumstances according to the individual methods of the writers.

Jerome K. Jerome, the English writer, once published a book entitled "How to Write a Play." That was years ago. He described the stage and how to go about the work. Generally speaking, the book was a handbook, but still it could not tell the reader how to write a play. It gave him the outlines of the technique, but it did not tell him how to feel what he wrote. This cannot be done. Do you think anybody else could write Lux Graphicus? Of course not. Because Lux Graphicus (meaning me) feels what he writes, draws upon his own experience and observations. Somebody else, of course, could fill this page as well and perhaps better than I, but Lux Graphicus's touch would be absent. The personal touch counts for much, probably in scenario writing as in producing.

Adverting to Jerome's book, there is one very funny passage in it. A modern theatrical manager is supposed to be approached by Mr. William Shakespeare with a manuscript of the play of "Hamlet." When the manager came to read the famous "To be or not to be" speech, he ridiculed it. It was too long; it was not snappy enough; it had to be cut down. Similarly the scene in which the gravedigger and Ophelia figure was not considered funny enough by the manager. The moral of this is, I think, plain. The scenario writer must study the apparent needs of the film makers as shown by the work they are putting out. For example: Mr. Selig appears to favor great spectacles; the Essanay Company like comedies; Lubin, too, has a strong comedy vein, etc., etc. What suits one maker does not suit another. I hope these few ideas will be useful to my correspondent. I am printing them not alone for his benefit, but for that of others who may be puzzled to know why their plots are not accepted by the film makers.

"Unexpected Help" (Biograph).—How strong an incentive a six-shooter in the hands of a determined individual may be is graphically illustrated in this picture. Probably the effective argument which forces the gambler to disgorge his ill-gotten gains will be looked upon as the most striking feature in the picture, but there is a strong moral lesson which deserves equal consideration, conveyed in the difficulty in which John finds himself as a result of his indulgence in a little drink. It is unsafe to tamper with one's weakness, ever when one feels strong enough to withstand any temptation that may arise. Some will recognize this feature of the picture, while others will see only the spectacular hold-up of the gambler. After taking part in these warlike and effective demonstrations the good priest takes the opportunity to read John a strong, admonitory lecture on the dangers of gambling. Altogether the picture is good and deserves a long run.

"Wifie's Mamma" (Lubin).—An old joke in the hands of Lubin becomes new and so instinct with life that the audience feels certain they have made a fresh discovery. And being convinced of this, they continue as scene follows scene, all exhibiting the frantic endeavors of hubby to dispose of her. Then wouldn't it jar you to learn that she wanted to go away all the time, but hubby was making it so pleasant for her she hadn't the heart to leave him. Of course, one's idea of what is pleasant may not coincide with the good lady in question, but there will be no two opinions about the fun all the disturbances cause. That will be certain from the beginning.

"The Woman in the Case" (Melies).—A story which possesses a fair degree of interest, and at least the novelty of showing what may sometimes happen when a woman gets into a situation. In business they do the unexpected, and because one man was gallant and the other was not, the latter receives no consideration whatever. All of which teaches, as the old story books say, that it pays to be courteous, even to strangers in trouble by the wayside. Aside from this single point the film does not rise above mediocrity.

"The Cowboy's Strategem" (Selig).—When this firm makes a cowboy picture it makes a good one, devoting more than ordinary attention to the numberless little details which go to make it interesting. Here is a genuine cowboy love story, with a jealous girl who makes it interesting for the young man until he resorts to a strategem which effectually overcomes all opposition by squaring matters with the raging girl. The picture is full of action and at no point is there sufficient weakness to spoil the film, or cause the attention to flag. It is one of those genuinely hearty pictures that appeal to everyone and affords more than the average entertainment.

"A Frontier Hero" (Edison).—An exciting story in which a dog plays an important part. Frontier life is always interesting and in this instance it is exciting. The incident portrayed could have happened in any frontier settlement in the country and is, therefore, a type. The introduction of the dog who helps the boy find the lost child adds interest. One thing deserves the heartiest commendation, the dangers of frontier life are faithfully shown, yet no one is killed and the child is returned to her parents safe. The imagination supplies all the necessary adjunct of horrors, and death or scalping are not required to impress these things upon the mind. Accurate staging and costuming are important features. The picture affords a clear impression of Kentucky frontier life and enables one to understand with what the settlers had to contend. Produced in the Edison way, with sympathetic acting and excellent photography, the picture conveys a strong impression of the times, without resorting to horrors in doing it.

"An Unexpected Reward" (Edison).—Sometimes the reward offered for a service is sufficient to attract a mass of seekers. Sometimes not. Here is depicted a girl who has two lovers, not an uncommon occurrence, it is true, but one is much braver than the other and saves her life, besides recovering the bracelet she lost and for which a substantial reward was offered. The brave lover is much surprised when he receives, not the reward offered, but one very much more to his liking. Perhaps it may be said with truth that none but the brave deserve the fair, and if the brave receive what is obviously their due, who can enter a complaint? The story is graphically told and beautifully photographed and the life-saving scene develops a thrill or two worth feeling.

"Bumptious as an Aviator" (Edison).—This highly diverting individual appears as the constructor of an airship. And then he flies. But what's the use? One couldn't tell the story in a week. It must be seen to appreciate the difficulties and troubles into which Mr. Bumptious is entangled. How he flies is the funny part of the film, and that the photographer has told with appreciation of the fun in the picture.

"Tommy Gets His Sister Married" (Pathe).—Possibly the methods used by this enterprising young gentleman would scarcely be satisfactory to the average unmarried female, but they worked in this particular instance, and, having succeeded in his endeavor, Tommy is correspondingly happy.

"Pure Gold" (Kalem).—A story of truth in a woman, worked out through the love vicissitudes of a broker who lost his fortune and was spurned by the girl to whom he was engaged. But in a mining camp he finds gold, plenty of it, in the ground, and the purer gold in a woman's heart, one who accepted him for himself, not for his money or what his money would buy. Melodramatic in its scheme, this picture is full of action and will hold the close attention of any audience throughout its length.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin, II." (Vitagraph).—The second film illustrating this once popular story. It carries one forward to the death of Eva, showing the affection of Eva for Uncle Tom, the purchase of the old negro by St. Clair, the appearance of Topsy and finally Eva's death. The staging and scenic effects are wonderfully well produced and the story is followed closely enough to make it plain to those who have read it. On the other hand, should anyone see it who never read the story the picture tells it plainly enough to make it understood.

"Broncho Bill's Redemption" (Essanay).—A fascinating story of life on the plains, showing how even a bad man found his heart and developed a strain of goodness he did not know he possessed when he found a girl and her father in need of assistance. He brings them safely to town where they can obtain medicines, but in doing so subjects himself to arrest. However, when the sheriff understands what the desperado has done he permits him to go free on his promise that he will mend his ways. With no killing, without even a suspicion of a love story, this film is strangely interesting. There is a whole lot of humanity represented in it, and one feels something of the inspiration of an optimism which inculcates the belief that there is some good in everyone, provided that the means for discovering it can be found. Perhaps nothing makes such a strong appeal as weakness, and sometimes, as is so graphically shown in this film, much good is accomplished even by those who are weak and apparently helpless.

"The Sculptor's Ideal" (Gaumont).—Just what there is in this picture to interest an American audience is not clear. The purchasing of a female slave for a model may not be unusual with foreign sculptors, but to become enraged because someone else admired her and return her to the market is disagreeable. Yet it all ends happily because the lover finds and purchases her himself. There is, however, a certain degree of repugnance associated with this idea of buying and selling human beings which detracts, in some degree, from whatever other attractions the picture may possess. Perhaps most American audiences would be quite as well pleased if this film were left off the programs.

"The Forbidden Novel" (Gaumont).—A humorous skit illustrating the proposition that it is much easier to preach than to practice, as different individuals prove by their actions. The forbidden book makes the rounds, finally returning to the cook, from whom it was originally taken, and she bears it away in triumph. But the whole circle had tasted of its forbidden contents during the process of attempted instruction.

"Cagliostro" (Pathe).—Striking scenes from this world-famous impostor, imprisoned in the Bastile, condemned to death by the Inquisition, which sentence was finally commuted to life imprisonment. Graphically the story is told and the career of one of the most famous criminals in history is made plain to thousands who never read Goethe's eloquent description of his exploits.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin, III." (Vitagraph).—This film, the last in the series, illustrates the re-sale of Uncle Tom to Simon Legree, the escape of Cassie and the cruel punishment and death of Uncle Tom, with the accessories which are described in the novel. What is said of this film may be accepted as applying to the entire series. Probably few novels offer such a fertile field for exploitation in motion pictures as this. The incidents, as described, are dramatic, but they are more. They arouse the emotions more forcibly than almost any other book published, and in playing upon the emotions they excite interest. The acting is sympathetic, with full appreciation of the possibilities of the piece. Perhaps few reproductions of long stories have been so well done. The difficulty generally is that the stories seem disconnected and in a way meaningless, but in this instance the continuity has been preserved, even in the process of elimination which has been especially severe. But the novel has so many salient features that with only the most prominent shown there is no trouble in holding the interest of the audience. The series will be recognized as an achievement of importance, calculated to excite more than ordinary interest in the minds of almost any audience.

"An Arcadian Maid" (Biograph).—Fate sometimes overtakes those who betray trusting innocence and does it so forcibly that there can be no question of the result. Here is a villain who induces a trusting girl to commit a robbery. But his ill-gotten gains do him no good. In a brawl on the train he either falls or is thrown out, and later falls dead at the feet of the girl he has deceived. Just how he got to where the girl was in the woods is not quite clear, but perhaps for dramatic purposes it is not altogether necessary. She, realizing the probable results of taking her employer's money, secures it from the body and returns it before the loss is discovered. In so much the audience can rejoice. If the object of the film is to show how easily innocence may be entrapped into wrong doing the success is marked. If it was the intention to show that punishment is almost certain to follow such villainy it is equally successful. Dramatically the film is good, and photographically it is up to the Biograph standard.

"Three Hearts" (Lubin).—A graphic heart story that will appeal with irresistible force to a vast majority of motion picture audiences. The hospital scenes were made in a hospital in Philadelphia and actual patients, not actors, were photographed. The story will touch the heart, and as it develops it will be followed with close attention. Worked out with the care for which the Lubin people are well known, and cleverly photographed, the film will add materially to any program of which it is made a part.

"Betty as an Errand Girl" (Pathe).—A comedy representing the efforts of Betty to achieve success in her chosen field. The many scrapes into which she plunges add materially to the interest of the picture, and where they are funny, as some of them are, they improve the humor of the audience.

"Hunting Bats in Sumatra" (Pathe).—A graphic illustration of a curious occupation. The methods of hunting the bats are shown and one acquires a good idea of the way the work is done. There is the setting of an unknown country to add interest to the picture. It will form another notable addition to the long series of industrial films which this house has issued.

"Her First Long Dress" (Selig).—Here is a bit of comedy that scintillates with flashes of humor. The picture will be accepted as representing an interesting episode, worked out with a full appreciation of the fun concealed in it.

"Shrimps" (Selig).—An educational film of merit, conveying information in an interesting, and in some instances, novel way. Probably few have realized that the shrimp was worthy motion picture exploitation, but this film will disabuse their minds speedily. It is admirably done and conveys the impression intended very cleverly.

INDEPENDENT.

"Summertime" (Imp).—A combination of love scenes in the "good old summertime" that makes one remember the days of yore. Here are three couples as spoony as can be, and one little girl alone. But she manages it very cleverly and ultimately gets the best of the lot. A rather amusing film, yet without any particular features, excepting the one where the brother's friend suddenly appears on the scene and helps the girl to make good on her boast.

"A Romance of an Anvil" (Champion).—A story with a fortune as a motive for a murder and an innocent man accused, but saved by the testimony of a child who saw the whole diabolical performance. So the wealthy girl and the brawny young smith are married, and presumably live as all married couples are supposed to live. One doesn't quite like the murder, but perhaps it is essential for the unity and forcefulness of the plot.

"The Badgers" (Centaur).—A graphic illustration of the well-known badger game as it is worked many times over. Of course in this instance the conceit of the poor fool who is badgered supplies some amusing comedy, but nevertheless the picture is pretty nearly free from the same. It is interesting because of this, and it adds what makes it appear ever better, a bit of love which prevents the story from becoming dull.

"Bear Ye One Another's Burdens" (Imp).—Here is a story that goes to the heart in a way that would be difficult to explain, yet it is easily understood when the picture is seen. The wife bears her burden complainingly and the palsied invalid in the next room doesn't know the difference in their circumstances. But it comes about in a dramatic way that he learns and life comes back to his palsied limbs, and the picture closes with a reunion and change which brings happiness to the three. Those who criticise the moving picture should see this one, they should carefully study the lesson it teaches and perhaps they would agree that some good can come out of a motion picture after all. It is one of the strongest of the week and should prove popular with any audience.

"In the Wild West" (Bison).—A series of scenes graphically illustrating the wild life of the plains. Here are cowboys receiving their pay, and then immediately hurrying to the nearest saloon and dance hall to spend it. A stage coach is held up and robbed, and after a lively chase the robbers are cornered on the edge of a cliff, taken and relieved of the money they stole. One sees all these scenes with much satisfaction. There is an atmosphere of life and freedom about it all which is fascinating and holds one's attention until the last figure disappears from the screen.

"The Mermaid" (Thanhouser).—How a fake mermaid advertised a Summer hotel is humorously told in this picture. As an illustration of a bit of human nature it is a success and apparently accomplishes its purpose. At the close the hotel is filled with guests, while at first it was empty, and not until the fake mermaid appears in a tailored suit and explains the joke is the mystery solved. As a lively scene from contemporary life the picture is a success.

"For the Sake of a Child" (Great Northern).—This tells the story of a couple who disagreed, but settled their differences and lived happily together for the sake of the child. It is dramatic and emotional and is acted with discretion and sympathy.

"Fabian Arranging Curtain Rods" (Great Northern).—A skit which will keep the audience in a roar. Perhaps one can acquire some fresh impressions of the best methods of arranging curtain rods upon viewing this picture. If not he will discover some highly entertaining exhibitions of their perversity, and everybody will have a good laugh.

"The Two Bears" (Itala).—An entertaining dramatic picture, acted with discretion and appreciation of the possibilities of the piece. The drama is carried along to the climax with much force and the finale affords a suitable closing.

"Where Can He Hang this Picture?" (Itala).—A comedy which finally answers what appears to be a very troublesome question. The many attempts afford amusement and lead to the irresistible conclusion that picture hanging is not a regular stunt of the individual who is doing the searching.

"The Little Confederate" (Powers).—A drama of the Civil War, telling an interesting story, but its greatest attraction is the acting of the child. The Powers people claim she is the greatest child actress on the American stage, and certainly her performance here goes far to prove their assertion. All the work is admirably done, and the dramatic opportunities are strongly developed.

"The Vixen" (Powers).—A comedy that tells of the terrible temper of a pretty girl and what happened to her various admirers. The picture is a long series of laughs, and leaves an audience in rare good humor.

"The Soldier's Honor" (Eclair).—The view of honor held by foreign soldiers is altogether different from that which obtains in this country. When a man strangles his sweetheart here, whether he is a soldier or not, suicide will scarcely wipe out the dishonor which rests on his name. A number of pictures have been shown from time to time presenting this phase of foreign army life and now comes another from the Eclair people which is based upon the same proposition. It is, perhaps, needless to point out that such films can have but little attraction for Americans. And in this instance the story is made all the more depressing by the fact that the suicide is needless. The girl who was strangled recovers and refuses to make complaint, but the information arrives too late. The writer has expressed his personal opinion heretofore upon such pictures as this, and has heard many others declare that they do not like such films and consider them neither entertaining nor instructive, the two principal requisites of motion pictures.

"She Surveys Her Son-in-Law" (Eclair).—Another variation of the mother-in-law joke which has become worn in places since Rameses I. sprung it way back there in some ancient Egyptian dynasty. Of course the unfortunate individual is perpetually pursued by his captious and altogether too critical mother-in-law, and do what he will he can't escape her vigorous and unwelcome attentions. Jamming the garbage can over her head is an original method of subduing her, but as the film shows that it proved effective in this instance and may possibly be offered as a solution of a difficulty which appears to surround some unfortunate married men.

"The Irony of Fate" (Imp).—A story of illicit love which seems to be one of those dispensations of some overruling power that makes individuals helpless to stay the current of events. In this film there is a difference from many pictures of a similar character in that the man who wins the wife's love leaves her alone after the death of the husband. Just what the author tried to show here is a question somewhat difficult to decide. Possibly that was the irony of fate to which the title refers. Perhaps not. It must be confessed, however, that the story is not quite clear upon that point. Moreover, the outcome of the film is not natural and as it disappears one has a dissatisfied feeling which seems rather to increase as one thinks of the pictures. It is to subtle to be described, yet it is strong enough to make itself painfully apparent.

"The United States Revenue Detective" (Yankee).—A story with a very human incident. An officer may go on and capture lawbreakers without feeling any pricks of conscience, but when a wife or a child come into it a different proposition is presented. And the difficulties of the officer's position are increased when the wife has saved his life with her there are, men who can do their duty, as it is called, unmoved when an incident of this kind injects itself, but a majority of people would prefer the man who has sufficient heart to do exactly as this officer did. And even though it was a clear infraction of duty, practically everyone would applaud him for his action. Apart from this incident the film is a good one and develops some interesting and dramatic situations.

Mr. David Horsley thanks "Lux Graphicus" for calling his attention to the unpictorial posing of a still picture which appeared in our issue of July 23; and has promised that henceforth his still pictures will be as pictorially perfect as his moving pictures. Mr. Horsley, the dean of independents also remarks that, though an independent, he feels a bit proud to be placed among such good company as Lubin and Vitagraph.

The World wants to protest now and forever against the use of still photos as illustrations or advertisements of the motion picture. That is, unless it is taken with a special camera at the same time and from the same point of view as the motion picture was made. Specially posed still pictures of moving picture scenes do not interest us. An enlargement from the film itself always does.

FORTY-FIVE YEARS AT IT.

We present herewith the likeness of W. H. Johnson, proprietor of the Colonial Theater, Kalamazoo, Mich.

Mr. Johnson has been engaged in the amusement business 45 years, at one time having managed a theater when Booth, Barrett, McCullough and other celebrities were playing there. We fancy Mr. Johnson could recount some rare experiences, and it surely would be entertaining to listen to him.

During the last five years, he has been in the moving picture show business and claims to operate the best equipped house in Michigan. He tells with considerable pride the fact that in 1907 he purchased the first Motiograph which was put on the market; he has run the machine an average of about 75 shows a week ever since, and the total repair cost during the three years has been under $6.

THE KLEINE ECONOMIC SINGLE STEREOPTICON.

Manufactured and Sold by C. B. Kleine, 19 East Twenty-first Street, New York City.

In the evolution of the stereopticon, or magic lantern, time has given the single form of the instrument a place from which it will not be dislodged. In the old days no lecturer worth his salt considered his outfit complete without either a portentous looking three-decker or bi-unial, so that he might exhibit dissolving effects. But as time went on there was manifested a demand for a more compact form of instrument. So it came about that after a variety of illuminating processes, a single form of the instrument was found convenient, handy, portable and efficient. Indeed, the single lantern may be looked upon as, generally speaking, the best all round and most effective kind of instrument for use in such places as Sunday schools, lodges, small halls and the home. Probably the lantern is more generally used in those places than elsewhere and so the single form is assured of permanent popularity.

We recently had before us a specimen of the Kleine Economic Machine, No. 889, which is illustrated in the accompanying cut. As shown the illumination is obtained by inserting the plug into any chandelier or electric light socket that may be available. The arc gives a light equivalent to 400 candle power, which, in our experience, is a good workable power of light for comparatively small halls or apartments, with lantern slides of modern density. It is claimed to give a distinct picture 10 feet in diameter at a distance of 30 feet. The general design and construction of the instrument can be seen from the illustration. It will also be seen that it is fitted with a rheostat and arc lamp with incadescent lamp attachment. It is a well finished, easily adjusted instrument, and works smoothly and effectively. So many of our readers are interested in lantern slide projection that we can strongly recommend them to inspect the Kleine Economic with a view to trying it out. Complete as shown in the illustration it is obtainable at the moderate price of $42. All those who desire further particulars should write to C. B. Kleine at the address given, or better still, they should pay a personal visit and inspect the instrument.

A VISIT TO TOLEDO, OHIO.

Although it was a very hot July day, the exhibitors of Toledo did not seem depressed but, on the contrary, were doing a fairly good business for the season.

The good humor of the exhibitors had perhaps some effect on the renters, as the three film exchanges had no kick to offer, while they looked happy and seemed to enjoy a certain amount of prosperity.

Mr. H. E. Smith, of The Toledo Film Exchange, was all smiles, and now that the Sales Company and the insurgents have made peace, he anticipates a good Fall business for the Independent side.

Let us hope that the Independent manufacturers will realize that "Unity means strength," and if they behave themselves and use their time, money and energy to produce high class work, they will find in The Toledo Film Exchange one of the best equipped exchanges in the country to handle their productions. "A model exchange" is the proper expression and the Independents need many more of such broad minded renters, who know how to spend money to make money.

The Kent Film Service (licensed) is also a model of neatness and comfort; everything looks cozy, and, as every one was busy in each department, I had no need to take the word of Mr. L. B. Kent to understand that the business was good.

One reason is perhaps due to the fact that Mr. Kent washes his films. He claims that it does not only give more life to the films but gives better satisfaction to the exhibitors, who very naturally prefer good clean films to dirty ones.

I was rather surprised to find the Kent Film Service located in one of the tallest and finest skyscrapers of Toledo and when I expressed my surprise to Mr. Kent he told me that the owners of the building, the insurance men, etc., had declared that a well conducted film exchange is not the most dangerous tenant of our big buildings.

The Superior Film Supply Company, an Independent exchange, has changed hands and, as is generally the case when the owners sell to newcomers, the exchange has suffered a little dull time. The Superior Film Supply Company will not suffer long, as I found in Mr. H. R. Ashbrook a very enterprising business man, full of energy and of ambition for the future. Mr. Ashbrook has reorganized the exchange, he is buying extensively and is now in a position to take care of all business coming his way. The Superior Film Supply Company is well located at 325 Huron street, has spacious offices and is fast assuming the proportions of a first class exchange.

The different film exchanges claim some 15 theaters for Toledo, a rather small number for such an important town, but it is perhaps better to have a limited number than to have too many theaters trying to kill each other. I must state that Toledo reminds me of the beginning of cinematography, when exhibitors were friendly to each other and would send their patrons from one place to the other. Yes, I did not find the marked jealousy found in other cities. I have not heard a word of complaint from an exhibitor against one of his neighbors.

In general the moving picture houses of Toledo are well managed and in the majority of them you find a drinking fountain, supplied with ice water and clean glasses. Very few exhibitors show vaudeville acts, while the general tendency is for pictures only.

We do not find in Toledo costly theaters, although most of them are of a good design and substantial in construction. The uniform is not popular in Toledo, very few houses have uniformed attendants. Are they right? No. Clean uniformed door keepers and ushers always add a certain prestige to a place and inspire more confidence to women and children, who look at a uniform for protection. Uniformed ushers respect themselves and are not so liable to flirt with certain girls visiting the show.

The main moving picture theaters are as follows:

The Princess, a licensed house, is considered the money maker of the place. It is not a very large house and rather sober in decorations. The lobby, finished in hardwood and free from plaster reliefs, is rather severe in appearance, yet artistic in its way. The lobby is perhaps "unique," as it differs so much from the general run of construction. The severity of this lobby is agreeably relieved by a high polished railing in front of the ticket office and a very fine polished brass frame and easel for the poster.

The Crown is a pretty house and, although modestly illuminated at night, presents a charming effect. A large plaster crown, placed in the facade of the theater, has electric bulbs of different colors to represent the different precious stones, diamond, ruby, sapphire, etc. The lobby can also be called unique. The walls of the ticket office are entirely covered with mirrors, reflecting every person passing on the street. It is odd and a source of amusement to many persons. The Crown shows Independent pictures and a few vaudeville acts.

The Royal, opposite the Crown, is the house with the most elaborate front and lobby and can be called the finest of Toledo. The lobby, finished in marble and plaster decorations, offers a rather pleasing effect with its green color and the woodwork finished in mahogany. The ticket office, finished in mahogany with a white marble base, has some very fine stained glass on the sides and a well designed glass cupola. Some neat easles for the posters and, like the Princess and the Crown, a well polished brass railing in front of the ticket office. These polished brass railings seem to be very popular in Toledo, they are not only ornamental but they keep the crowd from jamming against the ticket office and perhaps keep many pickpockets from relieving visitors of their valuables. The Royal shows licensed pictures only.

The Sunbeam has a very wide exterior and although simple in decoration, is exceedingly neat in appearance. With such a wide front, the visitor is rather disappointed in finding one of the smallest auditoriums; but if small, it is very rich and cosy in appearance. On the walls, covered with a dark paper, hang a number of genuine oil paintings in their heavy gilded frames.

The Sunbeam is a double house. The lobby is one and only one ticket office. On one side is the moving picture theater where only the best Independent pictures are shown. On the other side is a vestibule arranged like a garden and, while serving as an exit for the moving picture theater, is the main entrance to the "Arcade," another theater, where vaudeville is shown and no pictures. This explains the wide front, as it is the exterior of two theaters. Both houses are owned and managed by the same party, one is devoted to the lovers of good motion pictures, while the other is the home of good vaudeville.

The manager of the Sunbeam believes that pictures should be shown two or three days in succession. He claims that when you show good pictures they advertise themselves and you always do better on the second and third day. It is because the Sunbeam could not get such a service from the licensed folks that the manager had to take the Independent films and, sticking to his belief, he changes only three times a week.

The Princess, the Crown, the Royal, the Sunbeam and the Star and the Superba, two smaller houses, are all located on Summit street, the main and shopping street of Toledo.

The Orpheum, a pretty house showing Independent pictures, is located on Superior street, but the details of the house could not be well studied as, during my visit, the Orpheum was showing the reproduction of the Johnson-Jeffries fight and to advertise the film the manager had an extra large banner that fully covered the whole front of the theater.

The other houses are located in the residential sections of the town and, as my time was limited, I had no chance to visit them. I passed in front of the Jewel, a neat looking house on Broadway, and also in front of the Jewel Airdome.

There is one more house in the business section of the town but really I do not know if I have any authority to mention it. It is the Victory, on Adams street. I was rather pleased with the appearance. I paid my admission to look at some licensed pictures, but when I asked the manager for some details, telling him who I was, he had nothing to say.

I was well satisfied with my visit, as Toledo proves once more that motion pictures are not failing and that we have at least another prosperous Winter in sight. In fact the exhibitors are full of confidence and several improvements will be made within a short time. The most notable of these improvements will be the remodeling of the Princess Theater.

The latest suggested ban on moving pictures is against kissing scenes. It is declared that kissing shall be depicted only either "by relatives, or the married." That is something new again. According to the distinction, a man may with propriety say that his wife is not related to him, that she is only his wife. How far do these featherbrains propose going? If this additional idiotic requirement is to be complied with, I insist upon another step: let each kissing character in a picture bear a sign denoting the rank of the one that is to do the kissing and that of the one to be kissed, so that if the audience gets the story mixed it will not be shocked by the thought that the kissing is not legal. Suppose we have something like this:

I am her cousin.
This kissing is licensed by the Board of Censors.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

Questions and Answers.—Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

DEPARTMENT OF WATER SUPPLY, GAS AND ELECTRICITY, CITY OF NEW YORK.

21 Park Row, July 20, 1910.

Editor Operators' Column, Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I beg to acknowledge receipt of your communication of July 11, enclosing clipping from your paper relating to certain questions connected with the licensing of moving picture machine operators.

You ask for a statement of the attitude of this department in this relation, and I shall endeavor to comply.

The State of New York, by an amendment to the Greater New York Charter, has seen fit to delegate a portion of its police power to this city and has designated the Commissioner of this department as the official who shall exercise such power in the issuing of licenses to such citizens of legal age as may be found competent after a practical examination.

You will observe that the law requires me to give a practical examination, and does not authorize me to license the applicant if, by any other means than by a practical examination, I arrive at the conclusion that he is competent. Whether I have the right to accept a practical examination given in Chicago or in Massachusetts in lieu of an examination of our own is a question of law which I do not care to raise until I shall have made an investigation of the methods of examination employed in those two localities and shall feel myself in a position to state whether the requirements there are greater, equal to or less than those adopted in this city.

It is my purpose, if I can secure certain additions to the force of this department which I am considering, to cut down the delays which have heretofore been experenced by operators who have come to this city and have been obliged to await their turns to be called for examination. Under previous conditions the volume of this work which we have been obliged to handle has made it impossible for us to care for applicants any more rapidly than we have done; that is to say, to examine them from ten days to two weeks after the filing of their applications. Why any outsider should claim the right to take precedence over our own residents and to be examined at once, I cannot understand.

Respectfully,
HENRY S. THOMPSON,
Commissioner.

The article referred to in the Commissioner's letter will be found on page 88, July 9 issue of The World. It may be as the Commissioner says that the law does not authorize him to license an applicant except his competency first be determined by actual practical examination, but it must be conceded that the intent of the law is that the Commissioner, through his representatives, be satisfied that the applicant is capable. Only that and nothing more. The "practical examination" is merely incidental. As a matter of strict construction of law I cheerfully concede the Commissioner to be right, but on a broader ground of justice I hold his position to be wrong. I do not assert that the test applied by the Board of Examiners of another city should be accepted in lieu of a New York examination further than would be involved in the issuance of a temporary permit to bridge the time until examination could be had. It is not a question of the outsider taking precedence of our own men at all. Our own men are privileged to register far enough in advance so that there will be no delay whatsoever in their case, but the "outsider" must register on arrival and then wait until examined, meanwhile losing all his time, and that loss has in the past amounted to from several days to weeks. But the crowning absurdity of it comes when the traveling show operator comes to town. He would be obliged to have possibly two hundred licenses, ranging in cost from nothing to $10 each, and before starting the show out he would have to spend at least six months traveling and taking examinations, for he could not expect the show to lay around a week, or even a day, while he was seeking license. Moreover, my dear Mr. Commissioner, I do not like the expression of "outsider." In these United States, as among its citizens, I most emphatically deny that it applies at all, in any way. The determination to endeavor to avoid delays in examinations for the future is to be most heartily commended. We all realize that the department is probably doing the best it can under the circumstances with the help at its command. But I must still insist that the card of another city as sufficient evidence of competency to entitle the holder to a temporary permit, allowing him to earn his living until such time as he can be examined. Also I must still contend that instead of city licenses there should be a State or Federal license, enabling a man to work at his calling wheresoever and whensoever he choose, from Maine to California and from Canada to the Gulf.

Competency.—New York City writes: "Regarding friend Cochran's plea for information: it takes a competent operator to put on a good show and to be competent the operator must know something of mathematics, optics and electricity. Even then it frequently requires considerable thinking and close examination to locate some little fault in one's machine, light or lenses. You can see the trouble on the screen plain enough, but finding its cause may be quite another matter. Operators in and around New York are fully 50 per cent. crank turners—not what I would call men competent to put on a good show. I have employed quite a few of them and know whereof I speak. Do you not consider, friend Cochran, that the more a man knows the more he is worth to his employer? I know of good operators who receive as much as any class of mechanic, if not more, but most operators are not worth more than they now receive, while but too many are not worth half their present salary? As to the conductor of this column asking too much of the operator, why that is just plain foolishness. I know the gentleman, have attended his lectures and learned many things from them which I consider of great value. He respects any man that is willing to learn. It is too bad that we havn't more men like Mr. Richardson in the business."

Many thanks for your kind words, New York! Your making a drawing of the position of the shutter was a very creditable performance, not that the thing was in itself remarkable for its brilliance but from the fact that you used your brains. Any man who would stop and think, closely examine the machine and "put two and two together" would do just as you did, or something amounting to the same thing. But the trouble is they don't use their brains, as a rule. The average "operator" (the average, mind you, I said) has a little knowledge and trys to smear it around to cover a very large space, instead of using his brains, acquiring more and becoming really proficient. I am trying to wake them up—to make them ashamed of themselves. The man who don't get hit by what I say won't squeal.

Weak Tension Springs.—Chicago, Ill., writes: "Will you kindly tell me the cause of the film moving up and down several inches on the screen. My operator does not seem to know what to do. We have an ——— machine which has been in use not quite a year. We have a 90-foot throw. What kind of screen would you recommend as best for moving pictures?"

You are not quite clear, Chicago, in your description of the trouble. If you mean that the picture slowly crawls up as the speed of the machine increases, in all human probability the trouble lies in your tension springs which sag down slightly under the friction pull of the film. The remedy will be a new set of springs. If new springs don't remedy it and you find by experiment that the sagging of the springs is really the cause of the trouble, then you must attach a small metal clip to the gate, so that the lower ends of the springs will rest on it, barely touching when the machine is at rest. If this seems not to be the cause then you will have to give me a more detailed description of the trouble. As to screens: if you mean the patented articles I cannot, of course, for obvious reasons, answer publicly. Aside from the patented screens the best thing I have ever found is plain, white plaster kept perfectly white and clean by careful sandpapering, or bleached white sheeting of good quality, kept perfectly clean and white. But a cloth curtain must be laundered once in two weeks for best results. It may look clean and white at the end of two weeks, but you just hold a new piece of cloth up beside it and notice the difference. When using such a screen I have two of them and put up a clean one each alternate week. Such a curtain should be stretched over a wood backing which is thoroughly coated with gloss white; not ordinary white paint, but gloss (damar) white. Sheeting may be had 8 feet or more wide.

No. 6 Machine.—Boston, Mass., writes: "I read the column every week and must say I have derived much benefit therefrom, as I am sure have all other men. Brother Sammons, of the Savoy Theater, was telling me you were in our city recently to examine their No. 6 Power's machines and took one of them back with you. Now I looked over that mechanism myself and found no fault in it. I would certainly, therefore, like to know what you discovered wrong. By the way, cannot you give us a little history about yourself? It certainly would be interesting to your readers."

The No. 6 machine referred to was one of the earlier type, when all the fitting of the intermittent movement was necessarily done by hand. Hand work is never so accurate as machine work. It isn't in the nature of things, especially when the work is gauged in thousandths and half-thousandths of an inch. There was some jump in the machine in question, due to faulty hand work in fitting the cam ring and star. You could not possibly be expected to detect this. The genevas are now entirely machine made and the fault named has been eliminated. As to history concerning the editor. Umph! Well, I'm afraid it would consume many pages of this paper, with slight value to its readers, though I appreciate the spirit in which the suggestion is made. Summed up, the history would amount to this: I entered this business (operating) determined to learn all that any one man could know about it. I let absolutely no opportunity slip to acquire knowledge. I made use of what few brains the Almighty had endowed me with and was never afraid or ashamed to admit lack of knowledge, if I did lack it. I was all ears when someone was talking on a subject of which I thought they knew more than did I. After they were through and I had pumped out of them all I thought I could I pieced together what they had told me and whatever I already knew of the subject, rejecting that which did not "look good." By this process I usually arrived pretty close to the goal of correct knowledge. I have been a persistent and consistent seeker after projection lore ever since I entered the field and expect to be till I leave it, which probably means until the switch is pulled which puts out my light of life. My first projection experience was with a MacIntosh stereopticon of the round metal body type, called, if I rightly remember, the "Chicago Model." With this machine and a lot of Civil War slides I gave street shows in the Cripple Creek district in about 1894, or maybe it was 1895, interspersing the views with advertising slides. I used gas, of course.

Picture Moves on Screen.—Aberdeen, Wash., writes: "Why does the picture move up and down on the screen? Have heard this point argued by several of our operators and am curious to know just what the cause is. One claims it is the fault of the sprocket holes and another something else. My own idea is that it is in the machine itself."

Aberdeen will please read answer to Chicago, Ill., this week. It covers your own case exactly.

Position Wanted.—I have the name of an operator, located in Hazleton, Pa., who has five years' experience and wishes position. Will furnish references. Believe him to be a good man. Name on application.

Necessary Knowledge.—Mr. B. E. Newman, traveling with a road show, writes: "After reading Mr. George L. Cochran's letter in the column I take the liberty of expressing my opinion regarding the amount of knowledge an operator should acquire to fill a first class position. But first let me say that a man who is not an operator is not qualified to criticise or say where the operator's ability should end. I have passed several examinations in different cities and they are a whole lot easier than they would be had I the handling of them. To be a first class operator a man must be extremely careful, possess a thorough knowledge of the different kinds of electric current and know how to handle it properly. Also he must know when he is handling it right or he cannot hope to get the best results. He must be able to measure and figure the focal length of the different lenses or he will be up against it, especially with the road shows. He must be of a mechanical turn of mind or he cannot care for his machine properly. After several years' experience and hard knocks with road shows and positions in some of the best houses in the country, with salary ranging from $30 to $50 per week, my experience tells me that a man must possess the afore-named qualifications to rank with the best. Don't expect those salaries any more, brothers—too many crank turners now."

The above letter requires little comment. It evidently was written by a man who has "been through the mill" and knows whereof he speaks.

Information Wanted.—Seattle, Wash., propounds the following: "Please give me a correct formula for measuring focal length of stereo lens, also reason why they cannot be used as moving picture lens. Please give formula for figuring number of volts and amperes used at arc. What do you mean by 'back focus' and 'equivalent focus'?"

Pin a sheet of white paper to a wall, opposite a window, the wall being 15 to 18 feet (the further the better) from the window. Hold lens (either stereo or moving picture) between the paper and the wall, the hood (front) end toward window, and move toward and away from the paper until there appears on the paper a sharply defined picture of the window. Now, holding the lens still at point where picture is sharpest, measure from the paper on which picture is projected to back of lens (that is to the exact central point between the back and front lenses of the lens). If you take the first measure it will be the "back" focus, while the second is the "equivalent" focus. The equivalent focus is the back focus plus half the distance between the two surfaces of a lens when we speak of equivalent focus. The equivalent focus of a condensing lens is ascertained the sum of the back focus of the two lenses. The only formula of use in figuring number of amperes used at arc pre-presumes that you know the other two factors, viz.: the exact voltage and the exact number of ohms resistance. The formula is:

Erase the quantity desired and solve remains is the answer. For instance: Suppose we want to know what resistance, in ohms, a rheostat must have to give us 30 amperes with a pressure of 110 volts. We just erase the "ohms" which leaves volts divided by amperes for the answer. First, however, we must subtract 45 from the voltage (110—45) because the arc itself offers resistance equal to a drop of approximately 45 volts. It must always be remembered that on 110 volts the arc itself offers about one-third of the total resistance. The stereo lens is of too long focal length to use for moving picture lens.

Fifteen Dollars a Week.—Mr. Harry Danto, recording secretary Moving Picture Machine Operators' Protective Union, No. 182, Boston, Mass., writes: "I always thought you were a friend to the operator. I, as an operator, on my own behalf, am writing you to ask whether or no you think it right for The World to publish the Taylor School advertisement in which they state they can guarantee $15 a week to operators. I have no obection to Mr. Taylor's school, but in your honest opinion, Mr. Richardson, don't you think the operator is worth more than that sum? I don't mean crank turners, but operators who know their business! If you are a friend to the operator I shall expect to hear from you through the column."

Brother Danto, let me tell you that I gave some of the very best years of my life to the labor movement. I joined the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen in 1884 and for many years was continually an active member of labor organizations. I was for three years owner and editor of the Pueblo Courier, the largest (in point of paid circulation) labor paper ever printed in these United States. If, therefore, I am not a friend of labor I must certainly have wonderfully changed. I think I am a friend of the operator—I certainly hope so! Now, as to the Taylor School ad. I can see no possible objection to its publication in the columns of this paper. In the first place The World, while it is in every way desirous of aiding the operator, as it has proven, is in no sense a labor paper but strictly a trade publication, taking side neither one way or the other as between the employer and employee. In the second place, as a matter of fact, in four cases out of five, it is the manager, not the operator, who is the subscriber to the paper. And the operator does no advertising at all of any kind. Still while receiving very little financial support directly from the operators, The World has always been, is and will continue to be, in every way fair to the man who turns the crank. But I take an entirely different view of Mr. Taylor's advertisements than do you. Mr. Taylor advertises to furnish good operators for $15 per week, yes. Remember this, however, there are different grades of "goodness." You cannot get Mr. Taylor's best men for that sum, nor by a long jump. I think the advertisements do no material damage in the matter of educating managers into establishing $15 as standard pay. In reply to your query as to my idea of what an operator should receive, I will say that I would consider $25 for an evening show and $35 for a two-shift house ($35 a shift) as what the operator should receive, and what he will receive some day, too. This may seem very high to managers but it must be remembered that the real operator who puts up a high class performance must have brains and know how to use them. You cannot buy brains for a song

No, Friend Danto, it is my opinion that the school is doing vastly more good than its advertisements are doing harm, if the latter is working any injury at all, which I seriously doubt, the while not disputing but that you honestly believe they are.

License Information Wanted.—Brattleboro, Vt., writes: "Kindly inform me, at once, where I can procure some application blanks as I am thinking of applying for a Massachusetts license; also will I be required to appear in person for examination? If so, where? Kindly state charges in reply. Am anxious to procure license at once. Please give this your immediate attention."

Inasmuch as not even postage is enclosed, Brattleboro is pretty cool about his requests, or demands. But just to show that I'm a good scout, I have sent to Boston and secured the desired information. Here it is, thanks to my good friend, Mr. Campbell, manager Savoy Theater, Boston: Application blanks may be secured by applying to Chief J. H. Whitney, Massachusetts State Police, State House, Boston, Mass. After filling out same it is usually from a week to ten days before the applicant is notified to appear in person at the State House, Boston, for examination. Fee is $3, payable at time of examination.

Various Things.—Somersville, N. J., writes: "Mr. Cochran's letter, your reply thereto, with invitation to others to express their opinion, is worthy of more than a mere reading. When you say that an operator should be able to measure the focal length of lenses, figure the proper lens to give a certain size picture at a given throw and have thorough knowledge of electric current as applied to projection you are right. The operator should know these things and in addition be a good mechanic—at least good enough to appreciate the fact that a projection machine is a considerably finer piece of mechanism than is a threshing machine. Now, Friend Richardson, you have been putting up a lusty, well advised 'holler' about operators in and about New York who turn the crank too fast. Do not be too hard on these boys, since you must admit most of them have good, white light, which would seem to indicate that they are pretty good operators. You would greatly strengthen the cause of those who really desire to run a good show if when, in your visits around town, you see one who is running about the right speed you would give him and his house favorable mention in The World, as you did some weeks since in the case of the Harlem Opera House. That was good work, Mr. Richardson. Keep it up, not forgetting to hand out a roast where it is needed."

Nothing in all this wide world, Somersville, would please me better than to be able to praise, but I simply can't do it. You say most of them have "white light." Umph, yes, and shadows top, bottom or sides two-thirds of the time! I well know that the matter of over-speeding is often the fault of the manager, but shadows and other faults are not. Rest assured that I shall praise whenever I can justly do so. But remember this, I am a crank on good projection. I have three houses in mind, which, while the performance leaves considerable to be desired, I intend to give some praise. They are small houses but the projection is quite passable.

An Excellent Letter from Rosedale, Miss.—C. M. Rosselle writes as follows: "You invited the readers of your column to give their views as to 'How much an operator should know about his business.' I can tell you how much I would like to know, as I am an operator myself. I would like to know and will strive to learn everything I can about everything pertaining to the business.

"How much should a lawyer, doctor, preacher or anybody know about their profession?

"I am running a small theater in a small town and give my patrons just as much show as I can afford and sometimes a little more. I have managed to please nearly the same crowd every night for more than eighteen months, but though they say that I am improving, I am not satisfied. I wonder what you would say if you could or would sit out one of my performances. Being a pretty good judge of human nature, I think I know just what you would do. You would come up and help me out, as you are trying to do with some of my learned, mutton-headed brothers up there where you have real picture shows.

"A man that won't accept good advice and will not admit that he may be wrong, is the kind that should and no doubt does fill those ten and twelve-dollar jobs. Your Operators' Column is my Hoyle.

"Now for some dope. Is there a device for tightening up the belt tension, as the film loads up the take-up, so as to have an even pull at all times? If not, can't some of you chaps get to work on this idea—it's free, but you might tell me how it works after you get rich on it.

"As the lower reel begins to fill up have something to lightly touch on the outer edge of the roll of film that would cause the belt to tighten up a little—or it may be governed by the weight of the lower reel as it fills up.

"As it is I have to loosen up when I start and tighten up as I near the end, otherwise the tension that will carry a full reel makes the machine pull rather heavy to start off and sometimes pulls apart a patch made mostly by the 16-year-old glass."

I like the "I am not satisfied" sentence, Neighbor Roselle. The man who is satisfied with his present performance never gets any better. He is done. As to the tension equalizer, the man who can solve that little problem has a fortune at command. It is one of those things which "look" easy but—.

A Visit to Stroudsburg.—In response to an invitation from Mr. Lester Hughes, who is a World reader, though not engaged in the amusement line, the editor and his wife had a most pleasant visit to the Delaware Water Gap country last Sunday. He visited two of the four motion picture theaters in Stroudsburg. The Grand Opera House, capacity 500, certainly shows remarkably good pictures. The projection was excellent, the screen free from shadows and the picture remarkably bright. Mr. Koch, manager, assured me he was running on the lowest contact of his Compensarc, yet the picture, which was 15 feet wide, was as bright as would be at all desirable. In fact it is questionable if it was not too bright. This was due to the curtain he uses, the same being his own invention. He has applied for a patent and is now ready to market it. The price will be quite reasonable and the curtain will, I believe, do all he will claim for it.

A Bundle of Questions.—Marietta, Ohio, propounds the following: "(1) When I start the machine the picture is clear and in excellent focus, but as soon as three or four scenes have passed it jumps out of focus. Have examined films and found it not to be due to oil or dirt. The focus seems to change on every new scene. Lenses are clear and free from oil. (2) When I change from moving picture to stereo I have to make the spot a great deal smaller. Should this be? (3) We use a Bell & Howell transformer (called the 'Kosmic'). On 35 ampere contact it gives a weak but steady light. On 45, 50 and 60 ampere contacts it is bright but sputters and is hard to control. (4) What is your idea of a good connection at the lamp—something that makes good electrical contact and don't burn off too readily. My connections are tight but burn off very often. Use No. 4 wire to the switch and standard No. 6 from there to transformer and lamp. Current is 60 cycle and we use 60 amperes at the arc. Transformer gets quite warm. Should it? Lamp house also gives off much heat."

(1) If this occurs on all the films you run it is a very peculiar case and you have either not stated it right or I must simply give it up. If it occurs on only an occasional film it is quite possible that the film itself is at fault, the different scenes being taken with different lenses, their focus being a trifle at variance. I could offer several possible explanations if it occured only once in a while, but you say it is a continuous performance, in which case I am at a loss. More information is in order. (2) I take it you are using a "quarter size" stereo lens. Get a half size. There is wide difference in focal length of stereo and moving picture lenses and under certain conditions it would be necessary to move the lamp back or forward every time you changed over, especially with a quarter size stereo lens. I could tell you more about your case if I knew the width of both pictures and the throw. (3) The "Kosmic" (the Bell & Howell transformer) is an excellent machine, but all of them I have seen have but three contacts, whereas you name four. From your description of the trouble I would infer that your "Kosmic" is one wound for some other cycle than 60. Write the Bell & Howell Company, care Geo. K. Spoor, 61 North Clark street, Chicago, Ill., setting forth your trouble in detail, and I think they will be glad to make whatever may be wrong right. (4) The Operators' Handbook, soon to be issued by The Moving Picture World (price $1.50), will give description and picture of just such a connection as you wish. Your lamp house naturally will give off much heat when using 60 amperes, but the "Kosmic" should not get so warm you cannot hold your hand on it with comfort. Your wires are all right.

HANDSOME HOUSES IN CINCINNATI AND THE SOUTH.

The marble ticket office in front of the Bijou, Cincinnati, is of simple but rich design, with fancy brass grille work and surmounted by a dome of fine open metal work. The balcony, with its green (natural) plants and flowers in bloom, calls for much admiration and gives an atmosphere of freshness to the place.

Here again I noted a total absence of ugly loose posters. The posters are framed, even the advance poster of the "Roosevelt's Return" film is framed and placed on a neat easel.

The interior of the Bijou is a little gem of artistic decoration. The walls are covered with fine paintings, framed in delicate plaster trimmings. The arch of the stage is a very happy combination of fine relief plaster work with soft fresco painting.

The Airdome, at Newport, Ky., just on the other side of the river, has a modest but neat entrance. The interior is par excellence for the hot Summer evenings; it is no more a common theater, but a real garden. No floor; the chairs rest on a well graveled ground, beds of natural blooming flowers are on the sides, in the corners, around the stage, etc., even a small fountain plays its waters. The roof is a patented sliding affair, which can be opened in different sections at any time and can be closed as quickly in case of a storm, and this before the rain can reach the spectators. Pigeons, doves, birds, baskets of flowers, etc., are hanging from the rafters of the roof and swinging under the touch of a gentle breeze, adding much to the charm of the place.

Wm. Manwaring, the manager, is also the drummer, and he is known as the very best man for sound effects. His collection of traps is the most varied, yet when he is short of any special trap, he calls on his power as a ventriloquist and it is said that he can give some imitations that cannot be heard in other theaters. It is reported that in a Selig film, when a bulldog holds on to the pants of a tramp, Mr. Manwaring made a great hit in imitating the dog and the tearing of the pants.

Returning to Cincinnati, I wish to call attention to a house with a very small frontage, called the Pastime, one of the purest architectural design. The lobby is small, we have no ornaments but straight lines, yet it is the richest place in its simplicity.

We have a number of other good houses in Cincinnati calling for a word of praise: The Colonial, with its extra wide frontage, giving it the most commodious lobby; the Sun Theater, with its brass poster frames studded with electric light bulbs; the Alhambra, resplendent in its fresh decorations, etc. All of them are to be considered in a future issue, as I wish to say a word on the present conditions of the business in Cincinnati, in the hope that something can be done before the Summer months are over.

Cincinnati, with such a string of beautiful theaters, with such able managers, who seem to be experienced men, who know that the public is getting too wise to be constantly fooled with flimsy decorations or with an extra display of circus methods. Cincinnati, I am sorry to say, is suffering much from unfair competition.

If in Chicago and other cities the regular playhouses close their doors for the Summer months and by so doing give a chance to the moving picture theaters to get the few folks who do not run to the parks for fresh air, Cincinnati is keeping all its playhouses open, but instead of showing regular plays, they show an extra large program of moving pictures. This is an unfair competition and a state of affairs causing heavy losses to the local exhibitors, as the folks attracted by a large program abandon the fine, well-managed picture houses to run to the big playhouses, where they do not always find the same polite service, and if they are given five reels, the pictures are not of the best, the quality suffering for the quantity, and as the German lady said, "They are full of strings."

If the renters wanted to realize how much they hurt their regular yearly patrons, by giving service to the big theaters, they would rather lose the money coming from the playhouses, to protect the small exhibitors who bring them trade all the year around. The trouble is that with the great competition between the licensed and independent interests and the lack of a solid entente cordiale between the independents themselves, any faction who would refuse service to a big theater would be the loser, as another faction would quickly grab the chance.

Much has been said against the General Film Company, yet I sincerely believe that when said company will be in good working order, that all such abuses will be corrected, and I hope that the new Sales Company will recognize what good there is in the General Film Company and join hands for the betterment of the service in general. This is not an impossibility. If the General Film Company should refuse to give service to big playhouses and protect the moving picture exhibitors, the Sales Company could make it a point to refuse to sell films to renters who do not engage themselves to not serve the playhouses and to refuse any unfair competition. The day that the moving picture exhibitors will leave vaudeville to the playhouses and the playhouses abandon motion pictures to the moving picture exhibitors will mark a new era of prosperity for the cinematographic industry. THE AERODROME PARK, FAR ROCKAWAY, L. I.

Without doubt the most elegant open-air theater in Greater New York was opened on June 25 at Far Rockaway at an investment of $7,500, being built in eight days by the architects, Grossman & Kleinberg, of New York City, who, as may be seen by the accompanying picture, erected a place most unique and elegant in architecture. The interior, finished on the same lines and elegance, seats 1,500 people, and the whole leaves an impression of neatness and richness to the many large audiences, mainly Summer residents, who every evening have the park surrounded by their waiting automobiles. The carefully selected program consists of five first class pictures of the licensed manufacturers and illustrated songs by Mr. J. Eagan and Miss A. Bratley. The pictures, 18 x 27.5, are projected by two motion picture machines of the latest type, thus avoiding all intermissions, and are in charge of Mr. Beinard C. Cook, of New York City. The proprietor, Mr. Arthur E. Silverman, is well satisfied with the results of his enterprise, having very unique and up-to-date ideas, and is conducting his theater along unique lines, not showing anything but motion pictures and songs. He will not use any vaudeville at his theater. At the end of the Summer season Mr. Silverman will rebuild his theater and enclose same, to run through the Winter.

Mr. Cook writes us that the J. & J. pictures were put on at the airdrome this week. He says the crowds are orderly and appreciative and the fight pictures generally considered to be less objectionable than some dramas. As the fight pictures are billed to run all the week and perhaps longer, Cook says he was a bit surprised when a clergyman came around and solicited an advertisement of the show for a church paper.

THE EDISON SPECIAL FILM REEL.

As it is the little worries which greatly determine whether life is worth living, so it is with the little things in business. No one will realize this more than the exhibitor or operator who uses the film reel shown in the accompanying cut. A man whose name is coupled with big things has given some of his time to such a trivial article as a film reel. The inventor is the benefactor of mankind, but not more so than the man who perfects or makes practical the crude idea of the inventor. This Edison has done with the film reel, and the one before us seems free from any shortcomings that reels are heir to. The all-metal hub ensures durability. A large opening in the flange directly opposite a slot in the hub permits instant threading of the film. There are other points of superiority claimed, but the two named are sufficient to warrant the general adoption of the Edison Special Film Reel until some genius comes along with something better.

An invasion of the Sahara has at last become a reality and all picturedom have good cause to rejoice that Selig did it. For this announcement carries with it the redoubtable claim for prior and superior effect that will greet the great Selig following when the announcement is made public covering this gigantic undertaking, being, as it is, a drama with an all-absorbing story produced with every conceivable surrounding that the works of nature have endowed the great sea of sand.

Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—Will you kindly allow us to make the announcement to the trade that Mr. Fred Beck is no longer in our service.

DRAMAGRAPH COMPANY OF AMERICA.

EXPLAINING THE PICTURE.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Sir—Frequently we hear, "Will moving pictures continue to draw the people?" The writer of this article claims to be one of the pioneers of the motion picture business. Thirteen years ago last January I purchased an outfit, an Amet Magniscope and fifty subjects (50-foot lengths), from T. H. McAllister, 49 Nassau street, New York City. I never saw a motion picture until I tried my own outfit. It was a wonder, so pronounced by all who saw it. I was familiar with stereopticon work and naturally suppose that as the slides were always described, the moving pictures would have to be described also. Imagine describing such pictures as "Black Diamond Express," "Farmyard Scene," "Cavalry Charge at West Point," "Stopping a Runaway Horse in Central Park," etc. The truth of the matter was that the people enjoyed the show because they thoroughly understood the pictures and every point was brought out, or at least I tried to bring it out. That is how I drifted into a buisness that I claim to be the originator of: "Descriptive talker for motion pictures." That is what any manager who wants to be successful (and they all want to be that) will have to have: some one to explain the pictures, not to lecture, but to explain them in such a way that the audience understands the picture.

I have been with Mr. Wheeler, owner and manager of the Auditorium Theater, for two years. This theater seats 1,400 people and plays to capacity business three and four nights a week. Saturday nights we turn away as many as we show to. This is regular with us, and we don't run any vaudeville either. Mr. Wheeler has in his employ expert talkers behind the screen. The three principal talkers, Sherman Corse, Chas. Allison and Miss Anneta Shaw, have followed this particular line of work for five consecutive years. All heavy pictures are described; no pictures are run silent; we have the best of music at all times, piano, violin and drums with traps. Our singers are artists. We run four reels, two illustrated songs and spot. Our prices of admission are 5 cents for children, 10 cents for adults. We cater to the better classes—just as many diamonds to be seen in our audience as at any other theater.

I don't know anything about other city shows, but if anyone has a doubt about the drawing powers of the motion pictures (when understood) they should pay a visit to the city made famous by the Wright Bros., and cash registers, and see a real show, such as it put on by Ben Wheeler, the originator of talking pictures. Mr. Wheeler spares no expense. He does not change every day, only Mondays and Thursdays. Our film is three to four weeks old, so you can see what the people want, not a daily change, or first run either, but pictures they understand. Mr. Wheeler could run a year-old film just as successfully, if the film would be in condition to run, not full of rain storms and pieces cut out. He never tries to avoid what the opposition has run; that does not make any difference to our patrons for they stay to see them run here if they have seen them elsewhere before.

It would have done the Biograph people good to have seen the impression their extremely high class picture, "Love Among the Roses," made on the Auditorium audiences. They understood this picture, and I doubt if it had ever been run as good, surely not any better, elsewhere. I want to mention this to refute the statement that picture shows are dens of iniquity.

I have seen the picture business develop, and will say now that the picture show is still in its infancy. We need more managers like Mr. B. Wheeler, managers who will pay the money for people who can get all out of a picture that there is in it.

The Moving Picture World is always a welcome periodical at the Auditorium. It has been a great help to us in a good many ways. Our show runs continuously from 1 to 5.30, and from 7 to 11. The house is well lighted, in fact you can read a paper in almost any part of the house.

In your issue of the 11th inst., in "An Evening in a Brooklyn Moving Picture Theater," by Rev. Wm. Henry Jackson, he mentioned several subjects that would have been more enjoyable had they only been understood. That is what I contend: the time is not far off when all successful houses will either have talkers behind the screen or a delineator, not necessarily on the stage, as he may stand in any part of the house and make good.

WILL HEMSTREET.

Dayton, Ohio, June 9, 1910.

Bellows Falls, Vt.—Mr. T. F. Kiniry, who has been in the amusement field for twenty-five years, is to build a new moving picture theater just south of his present location. The construction is to be of cement blocks and fireproof inclined floor with an up-to-date stage. Three reels of pictures and two songs is the program at his present location, Dreamland Theater.

Cleveland, Ohio.—Mr. Mandelbaum, of the Lake Shore Film Supply Company, lets no opportunity escape him for introducing moving pictures of an educational character into schools and institutions. He recently entertained the teachers and pupils of the Technical High School with the following excellent program: "Poetry of the Waters," "Midsummer Night's Dream," "Trawler Fishing in a Hurricane." Needless to say the display elicited the warmest applause from the assemblage and was a convincing argument in favor of the introduction of the motion picture into the schools and colleges. We cannot understand the lethargy on the part of some film exchange proprietors to create business for themselves in a virgin and profitable field, especially when they have on their desks the Kleine educational film catalogue to aid them.

The Kalem Kid in the Role of "The Borrowed Baby."

KALEM NOTES.

In order to better balance their line the Kalem producers have been working of late on comedy ideas and it is promised that good comedy subjects will from now on be a regular part of the Kalem product. The best of the new series is called "The Borrowed Baby" and is announced for Wednesday, August 14. The theme is a variation of the popular "lost child" idea and embodies many original and highly ludicrous situations.

"The Call of the Blood" is the title of the latest Kalem Indian production. It is characterized with the same attention to detail that has made the others of this series so successful and the story in this production, as all other Kalem Indian films, is founded on an historic fact. The picture is a primitive problem play of the strongest type, and is a most important study in American ethnology.

COMING EDISON RELEASES.

Roy Norton, whose virile stories of the great Western country are at the exclusive disposal of the Edison Company, has contributed another scenario to their films in the dramatization of his "San Famille" under the title of "His New Family," to be released August 16. Wherever Mr. Norton's fame has reached and surely no hamlet in the country is so small or obscure as not to furnish its quota of admirers of the popular American author and the characters he depicts with such originality, vividness and power. "His New Family" will be sure of a warm reception.

"How the Squire Was Captured" is the title of the comedy release of the 19th, which is expected to prove a real "hit" with the motion picture patrons.

Another of the famous "Bumptious" comedies completes the reel of the 19th. In this one the ever egotistical "Bumptious" essays to drive an automobile containing a party of his friends, with no preparatory instruction in the art.

"Love and the Law," adapted from a portion of Dickens' "David Copperfield," is the dramatic release of the 23d. Remembering the success with which the Edison producers retained the true Dickens' atmosphere in "A Yorkshire School," it can be confidently expected that an equally worthy dramatization of his immortal "David Copperfield" story will be presented in this film.

"The Valet's Vindication" is the title of comedy written by M. W. Townsend and to be released on the 26th. The cast, with the exception of a few faces that will be recognized by every picture lover in the country, was specially engaged for this picture, which is played to the limit of perfection.

Mlle. Pilar-Morin reappears on the 30th in a special production, "From Tyranny to Liberty," a story of Russian oppression, which is said to splendidly fulfill its purpose in providing her with a series of dramatic situations which call for the widest display of her wonderful dramatic art.

"The Man Who Learned," a dramatic story with an educational and scientific side, will be released on September 2. This film was produced in co-operation with the Milk Committee of New York.

"The Big Scoop" the story of a young newspaper man's restoration to grace through his getting on the trail of a crooked financial deal, is the dramatic release of September 6.

"Alice in Wonderland," Louis Carroll's delightful fairy tale, will be released on September 9.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

Another Vitagraph night, at which the Vitagraph Girl appeared, was given at the Bay Ridge, N. Y., Airdome, corner of Seventy-second street and Third avenue. As usual Miss Turner was given an overwhelming reception and the Vitagraph pictures were heartily appreciated and applauded. The illustrated song, "The Vitagraph Girl," was sung, encored and repeated. The attendance was a record breaker, 1,300 persons were comfortably accommodated in the grove and open-air auditorium, which has an asbestos roof. A very delightful and novel feature of this place is the small tables which are located about the grove, at which are served ice cream and light refreshments within sight of the pictures.

"The Death of Michael Grady," announced for August 9, is a live one and will keep everybody in high dudgeon. It's the funniest thing that ever happened. If you want to see a good Irish play on the order of "Hogan's Alley" and "Squatter's Sovereignty," "The Death of Michael Grady" will make them look like dead ones.

"The Three Cherry Pits" is an odd but not very impressive name, perhaps; it is, however, a great picture involving a great story of a Napoleonic veteran who has been struck by three cherry pits thrown by three young men, with whom he later fights duels, wounding them where the pits had struck him, teaching them a lesson they never forgot, very much to the satisfaction of the old soldier's honor and the young men's benefit.

"Mrs. Barrington" will follow "The Three Cherry Pits" on Friday, August 13. This is a society drama, wherein a suspicious "busybody" is foiled, by established facts, in furnishing gossips with a choice bit of scandal.

LUBIN NOTES.

It is expected that full possession of the new Lubin plant will be had in about two weeks. The studio has been occupied since the middle of May, but the factory is not yet fully complete and will not be occupied until the finishing touches have been added. It is planned to close down the present quarters on a Saturday and resume work at the new factory on Monday. Moving will be an easy matter, since only the blank film stock and the office fixtures are to be taken to the new factory. All of the machinery of the manufacturing plant will be new, and will have been thoroughly tested before occupancy. At present three, eight-hour shifts are at work to keep pace with the increased orders.

Magazine editors usually buy manuscripts ahead in the Winter to guard against the drop that comes with the first hot wave, when the number of submissions drops to about half the Winter supply in quantity, and less than half in quality. But apparently the picture author is in a different class, for the production continues undiminished and the quality remains the same. The Lubin Company has purchased some important manuscrips in the past ten days and is rapidly adding to the number.

THE THANHOUSER TWO-A-WEEK.

What is, perhaps, the most popular of Mary J. Holmes' writings has been done into a strong "Thanhouser classic," for release on Friday, August 12. This is "Lena Rivers," the story of the girl who lost her father and who, as if by a miracle, found him again. It is a charming tale, carrying good love interest, and makes a charming picture. Miss Hemming, Miss Rosemond and Crane take the leading roles.

"The Mad Hermit" released by Thanhouser on Tuesday, August 9, is an odd picture in that the theme is new. At least this is true to the best knowledge of the producers. In a nutshell the theme is this: Instead of "the wrath of a woman scorned," consider the wrath of a man scorned. It's just as wrathy a wrath and has just as many dramatic possibilities.

STORIES OF THE FILMS

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

A SALUTARY LESSON.—God's greatest gift to the home is the child, and how often is it greatly appreciated. In this Biograph story is seen the result of the lack of attention toward the child which almost reached a fatal culmination. Mrs. Randall is strongly addicted to the reading of cheap novels, so much so that she has little time for anything in the nature of domestic duties. The care of her ten-year-old girl comes especially odious. Having to start seashore outings for the summer, it seems to take her to the limit to get matters satisfactorily cared for. Child bothers her, and after the latter enters the train it is a relief to the mother than anything else. Like the child herself on the boat. Everywhere connected with the monster calls and Mrs. Randall sets about to do her utmost to entertain us. While so engaged, Mr. Randall spots a very interesting and attractive young lady, and as a result of doing so receives her attention. The poor child is now left to its own devices to amuse itself. So neglected she wanders across the steamer to a distant, quiet bay. This portion of the vessel is entirely deserted and the child mounts a rock far inland on which she sits to rest. The journey has fatigued her and overcome by drowsiness she goes off to sleep. Meanwhile, her careless, indifferent parents are pursuing the bent of their own inclinations, mindful of what danger their child may be in. Sometime has elapsed, and the tide turning we find the rock on which the child sleeps completely surrounded by water with it still rising until it reaches her, waking her up. There she is marooned on the rock, with no help in sight. Her protracted absence arouses alarm and a search is started, but in vain, until a lifesaver strolling this distant beach hears a feeble cry. Looking in the direction from whence it came he espies a small dark object far out from land. This proves to be the child's head which now alone remains above the surface. He swims to her rescue, and carries her to her distracted parents, who have by this time been taught a bitter lesson as to what their careless indifference resulted in.

BIOGRAPH

THE HOUSE WITH CLOSED SHUTTERS.—What a contemptible type of human animal is the coward. He is totally devoid of all the elements that go to make up a man. Charles Randolph was one such as this, bombastic and haughty but with no real courage, and what was worse, a heavy drinker. He, his sister Agnes and mother were the only survivors of an old and distinguished fighting family. Agnes is high spirited and lovable, and at the beginning of the Civil War, Charles is carried away by the enthusiasm, and urged by Agnes, procures a commission in the Confederate service and is assigned to General Lee's staff. Members of the same regiment are Lieutenants Wheeler and Carter, both good natured rivals for the hand of Agnes. The story opens with the departure of the boys with their regiment for General Lee's headquarters, taking with them a large Confederate flag which Agnes had just completed. In Lee's tent Charles is given sealed dispatches and launched on a most important mission. It is a perilous undertaking, and during the course of the journey he becomes panic-stricken with fear, and drinks heavily, hoping to revive his waning courage. Completely overcome he dashes madly toward his own house, where he seeks to hide himself. Here he becomes very drunk and Agnes and the mother are horrified at the awful disgrace that threatens the family name. With sudden impulse Agnes decides to don Charles' uniform and proceed on the mission in his stead to return in time that he, when sober, may go back to report to General Lee the result. She makes the perilous journey and delivers the dispatch, but on the return she is caught in the battle's maelstrom with her horse shot down. She becomes imbued with the spirit of the combat and rushing into the very vortex fights as Charles never could have. In the retreat the flag is in danger of capture, and Agnes leaping over the breastworks, seizes it only to be shot down by a shell. No one has suspected that the gallant soldier was other than Charles, and news is sent to the Randolph homestead of his death. At the reception of this information, Charles realizes what a contemptible dog he is and the mother fully appreciating the awful disgrace the exposition of it would be, commands that Charles remain forever where he is for the good of the family name, that the world may not know his sister died protecting a coward. The shutters are closed and barred and all is mysterious and gloomy. At the close of the war the young suitors return, but are told that Agnes is not to be seen, being crazed from grief over her brother's death. Year and year it continues the same, the constant suitors growing old, leave their floral tribute at the door. Inside the darkened rooms Charles goes through the bitter years from youth to old age paying the price of his cowardice until death mercifully releases him.

WITH BRIDGES BURNED.—The first scene shows the office of Comer & Mathison, contractors, and the dismissal of Louis Mitchell, a salesman, not because of his lack of ability but because of the hard times which make it necessary for the firm to cut down expenses. Mitchell pleads hard for his position and for the opportunity to do great things for the firm, and intimates that on account of a personal matter he has just took out of This argument, while a good one, does not appeal to the hard headed business man, and even Mitchell's producing of the photograph of the "cute girl" fails to convince the older man. So Mitchell is obliged to go home to the little wife and tell her that they are now without an income. Of course she is distressed. Not in the slightest degree. She is just blue, and evidently equal to the emergency.

After a moment's comforting of the downcast husband she tells him that she has a position undertaking waiting for her. She says she is to engage the announcement that a big [illegible] is to build five cruising yachts destined to the Boers during the war in South Africa. The contract involves about three months' service and she thinks it is just about the size of work her husband would go after and get. He does not so absurd and he is told that Mr. [illegible] it at first and a good deal against it finally concluding with the unanswerable statement that the firm would not bother its vest to [illegible] after the contract. But even this does not daunt the young lady's determination to secure [illegible] announces that she has a plan [illegible] the work, and she has saved up and that she will succeed personal backer of the enterprise. The fact that she has only a thousand dollars and that the undertaking would naturally require about [illegible] fine material, is hardly an argument worth considering, and after a few tame protests directed to economic use, Mitchell, seeing he holds in the young wife's eyes, determines to go and do his very best to win the contract away from the rival concern on the other side. Of course the firm, having nothing to lose, are not loathe to let him make the attempt, and we see him at the desk with the little wife wondering the last misery of her savings, and soon at the yard, where she bids him good-bye and waves her handkerchief as the ship scuttles off down New York Harbor.

In London he finds the business methods very different from those in America, and runs up against a snag by reason of a rival salesman. Who is a little fearful of this American invasion, having conversed with the head clerk in the office to throw obstacles in his way. But, worse than that, when he finally succeeds in seeing the Director General of the big syndicate he learns that the mass of blue prints which he will be required to figure upon would normally take about three weeks time to go through, while he has but five days in which to complete this tremendous work. Nothing but the thought of the little girl who believes in him carries him through the attempt, which he makes with a gallantry worthy of knights of old. He locks himself in his hotel room and, without sleeping and barely taking time to eat in the five days and nights that follow, he goes through the mass of material and completes his work at the very last moment. But the rival salesman, knowing the situation, has contrived with the head clerk to set the clock ahead in the offices of the syndicate, so that when our half-frenzied hero arrives with his figures he is informed that he is five minutes too late, and that the legal hour for handing in the estimates has passed. If he had not worked five days and nights without sleep he probably would not be so easily turned aside, but the blow is too much for him and dropping the precious documents on the floor, he staggers out of the office, crushed and well-nigh frantic.

As see the little office boy pick up the envelope and put it in his coat pocket. Then the scene shifts back to the lonely little girl waiting in New York and to the unexpected arrival of her husband, who has not brought the contract back with him. Of course she is loyal and brave and tries to comfort him, but their hearts are nearly broken. Then there comes a telegram which makes the young husband believe that he is out of his head, for it is from his own firm and announces that the contract has been awarded to them, and that he is therefore made their General Sales Manager at a big salary. Of course, we can guess that the little office boy knew the plot and handed the papers in, and like the two young people, we would like to have hugged the office boy for his pelo.

U. S. SUBMARINE "SALMON."—The "Salmon" is the latest submarine added to the United States Navy. It was built by the Holland Electric Boat Company, Quincy, Mass., and is the largest yet constructed anywhere, being 178 feet in length over all and of about 370 tons displacement. She is equipped with port and starboard gasoline engines of eight-cylinder type, capable of developing 260 horse-power each. These engines are for surface running. For running submerged she uses a storage battery, which propels two 200 horse power electric motors coupled direct to the gasoline engine shafting. She has shown a proven speed of 14½ knots per hour running on the surface and 13½ knots per hour running submerged. It is expected that her speed on surface will reach 16 knots.

The "Salmon" is capable of making a dive in three minutes by shipping water ballast, changing from full surface to an entirely submerged condition in this short space of time. In making "porpoise" dives when running, water ballast is not used, the ship rising and sinking entirely by

His New Family

BY ROY NORTON

A wonderfully beautiful story. Upon the death of his mother a delicate but manly French boy is shipped to a western mining camp only to find that his father who had emigrated previously has just been killed in an accident. The ensuing story is a beautiful blending of pathos and humor of which Mr. Norton is such a master and one of the best by him.

fear, but he refuses at first to be a party in the deception and shows the maid a letter just received from Mrs. Van Camp, stating that she will be home at 12 o'clock and for Bob to meet her at the railroad station with the car.

Marie, however, insists that she will go and urges Bob to find a dress suit among the master's wardrobe, while she, in the meantime, will array herself in one of Mrs. Van Camp's evening dresses.

An hour later they are ready for the ball and sweep gallantly out of the drawing room with as much grace as even the fashionable Mr. and Mrs. Van Camp might have done.

In the ballroom Marie makes a decided hit and arouses the admiration of a princely young fellow, to whom she gives every dance. The evening flies away and as the hour of twelve approaches, Bob endeavors to find Marie, but she is nowhere to be found. Fearing discharge if he fails to meet his employer he hurries out, jumps into the car and speeds to the station.

In the meantime Marie is busily engaged with her young prince when the clock strikes twelve. However, before the last stroke of the hour she is seen flying down the stairs and so great is her alarm and apprehension that she loses a slipper and does not stop to pick it up, but hurries on. When her handsome young companion of the evening finds her gone he also rushes down the stairs but finds nothing of her, except the silken slipper.

The next morning the young man's mind is in a whirl as he thinks of the events of the night before. The slipper is in his pocket and occasionally it is removed and pressed to his lips. At the breakfast table there is an altercation with the cook, who immediately throws up her job and stalks out. Here is a pretty state of affairs for Jack's mother, who, that evening, was to give a party in honor of the young man's birthday. However, the father promises to visit an employment bureau on his way downtown and find a new cook. Here he meets Marie, who has been summarily discharged by Mrs. Van Camp, after she had learned the full details of the shocking incident. Jack's father employs the girl and she is given the name and address of her new mistress and told to see her immediately.

That evening Jack is in the dumps, despite the jollity of the others, and finally he is forced to confess to the merry-makers the real reason for his gloom. He is looking for Cinderella or the lady who can wear this tiny slipper. Then there is the fun of trying on the slipper, but not one of the girls present is able to squeeze into it. Jack is in despair when his mother announces that the refreshments are served and Marie, laden down with good things, comes into the room. She sees Jack and crash goes the cake tray. But Jack drags her forward and tells her to try on the slipper. She has no opportunity to demur and a moment later her tiny foot is encased in the slipper. With a glad cry and a toast Jack announces the finding of his Cinderella.

FEEDING SEALS AT CATALINA ISLAND.—This short educational subject was made on the beach at Catalina Island, off the coast of Southern California, and shows a party of tourists feeding the pet seals, famed to all tourists. These animals are very intelligent and absolutely fearless. Our picture shows Jupiter and Neptune, two of the largest of the herd, posing before the camera.

THE GIRL ON TRIPLE X.—Jack Hartley, the foreman of the Triple X ranch, is engaged to Nellie Monroe, the ranchowner's daughter. A quarrel starts between Jack and "Red" Williams, a cow-puncher, when the latter first makes advances to Nellie, and second, when Williams abuses a faithful Indian ranch hand. On this latter occasion Jack is unable to restrain his temper and the result is a short fist fight in which Williams is defeated.

Smarting under the punishment, Williams seeks revenge. For some time the miscreant cow-puncher has been in league with a bunch of cattle rustlers, whose several attempts at raid on the Triple X cattle, however, have brought them nothing, and due entirely to the alertness of Hartley, the foreman. They have sufficient cause to hate the manly young fellow and when Williams, after having been put out by the foreman, stalks into their camp, begging them to join him in obtaining his revenge, all are willing.

That they must be cautious, however, is plain to them when another of the band joins them, bringing in tow Indian Pete, whom he had found spying about the shack. When Williams sees the Indian and recalls that he was the cause of his beating from Hartley he is in favor of killing the Indian, but the others restrain him.

Having settled upon a plan of revenge, Williams is dispatched with a slip of paper, bearing a few words scrawled in lead pencil which is to be the undoing of Hartley, providing, of course, the game works right. The others ride off leisurely to the Tripe X horse corral and make away with a dozen or more ponies, while Williams is to work his end of the game with Hartley.

He finds Hartley at another part of the ranch and succeeds in establishing a reconciliation, after confessing his wrong and pleading forgiveness. Hartley gives him his hand and brings out his cigarette paper and tobacco when Williams asks for "the makin's." When Hartley is not looking Williams slips the bit of paper in among the rice wrappings, then bids Hartley good-bye and leaves to put the finishing touches to his nefarious scheme.

A few minutes later he rides excitedly up to the ranch house and calls loudly for Monroe. When the old ranchman appears, Williams tells him of the stealing of the ponies, and adds further, "And I know who's at the back of this dirty trick. It's Hartley. If you don't believe it I can prove it."

The alarm is given and Hartley, unsuspicious of the conspiracy, comes running on the scene. A little crowd has gathered when Williams makes his accusation. "I saw him with a bunch of greasers this morning, and I saw him get a note from them fifteen minutes ago, and that note is in the pocket of his shirt. Search him." The astonished and enraged Hartley is seized and searched. The note is found and reads:

> Jack Hartley Got the horses all O. K. and will divide with you to-night. Meet us at the usual place. The Bunch.

Hartley is given no attempt to defend himself despite Nellie's desperate pleadings. He is ordered to mount his horse and leads the procession on the way to execution.

In the meantime, Indian Pete, left with a drunken cowboy, makes his get-away and, with his hands still tied behind him, mounts a horse and rides desperately back to the ranch. There is no one there but the heart-broken girl. He tells her everything as she releases him and the two mount and ride at top speed to the scene of the execution. They are just in time. The Indian proves Hartley innocent and Williams is seized and stood in Hartley's place. The film ends here, with the embrace of the lovers.

GAUMONT.
(George Kleine.)

THE LORD'S PRAYER.—The Lord's Prayer! Even though we be engrossed in the utterly material, the common round of the struggle for bread or for gold and precious stones, how these words move us! Some of us may not even be sure of the words, so long it is since we knelt at our mother's knee and repeated it softly, rather abashed at the sound of the sacred symphony in our own voices.

Perhaps we may dimly remember just how we said it—slowly, very slowly, with quite a pause after each phrase—and maybe there was a picture in our minds for each group of words; a vague, glorious picture, with a glow of yellow light upon it, and a halo of exaltation around it. "Our Father Who Art in Heaven"—that tender address! Who is so absorbed in worldly matters that those words convey him no vision? "Hallowed Be Thy Name"—A chastened reverence fills our very soul; we see a world of bended heads, a study in humility. "Thy Kingdom Come, Thy Will Be Done on Earth as It Is in Heaven"—We are lifted up by a wave of reverence, an ecstasy of renunciation. "Give Us This Day Our Daily Bread"—How small and helpless we are, after all; supplicants for favor, lacking which we are but clay. "And Forgive Us Our Trespasses"—Are we not almost ashamed as we ask it? "As We Forgive Those Who Trespass Against Us"—We bow our heads in contrition as memories of anger and bitterness against our neighbor confuse us.

"Lead Us Not Into Temptation"—While the spirit is upon us, we almost think there is no temptation. "But Deliver Us From Evil"—evil! What dark vision is that our brain conjures up? But we smile; for are we not protected? "For Thine Is the Kingdom, and the Power, and the Glory, Forever and Ever—Amen."

What a study for the maker of pictures! To materialize in so far as moving pictures may be said to materialize—The half-formed visions of a sacred dream—The realization of idealization. It seems almost too much to expect; and yet it has been accomplished with a wealth of beauty and an inspiration of action that makes one forget it is a moving picture at all. Truly, there is an artist in the house of Gaumont.

There is an impressionable age which we all pass through, in which all things out of the ordinary leave a deep, almost extravagant impression upon us. In those years, when we witness the rendition of some heroic play by one gifted in the art of representation, we leave the scene so transported that we scarcely recognize our commonplace surroundings. The period passes as the years advance; but now and then, even when we think that quality of our soul is dead, a bit of nature, a strain of music, a picture will recall it. "The Lord's Prayer" is such a picture; and if one can witness it without experiencing that strange exaltation let him go home and, kneeling, repeat the sacred words until they become real to him once more.

THE CALL OF THE BLOOD.—During an Indian tribes' warfare the little daughter of one of the chiefs, who has fled in the panic with the other children, becomes lost and strays into the path of a pioneer family. The pioneers have just buried their only little child at the side of the trail and their hearts go out to the miserable Indian child who timidly approaches them for protection. They take care of her and bring her up as their own and the girl becomes in training and dress like one of her white sisters. There comes a time, however, that a young white man falls in love with her and her foster parents consider it their duty to tell both the girl and the young man the story of her origin. The girl's first impulse is a desire to see something of her people, and her father and her lover reluctantly consent to accompany her in a search for the tribe from whence she originated. Thinking that for one so young the wiles and cares of the world would be too much for her to cope with—even the poverty and hardship of her own people had it turns out that "The Call of the Blood" is too strong for when the tribe is finally located the young squaw completely forgets her foster father and her white lover, takes up with a young buck, whose squaw she becomes in spite of the arguments and protestations of her white friends.

THE BORROWED BABY.—The mixup all starts from the decision of the Bagleyville Dramatic Society to produce an amateur play. The cast calls for a baby. They believing it necessary to have a real baby at rehearsal, one of the girls volunteers to go to the home of a friend and borrow one. The friend happens to be out at the time, but a note which is left on the table explaining the situation blows out the window. There is first shown the experience of the baby in the hands of the amateur dramatic society and then the sensation when the mother reaches home and discovers that the baby is gone. The village constable is called in and the house is ransacked without results. In the meantime, however, the rehearsal is ended and the company proceeds to the baby's home. The leading man is detailed to take the baby in. Of course he falls into the hands of the constable, who thinks he is a kidnapper, and the picture ends in a scream of laughter with everyone trying to explain.

THE HEART OF A SIOUX.—Paul Hester, a young college graduate, is assigned to teach an Indian school on one of the Government reservations and takes his sister with him to make him a home. On their arrival at the mining camp some of the men decide to test his mettle, and one of them contemptuously kicks at his valise. Paul is quick with his fists, but the other, more adept with his gun, and at the sight of the blued steel cheeks Paul. But Fawn Heart, the daughter of the chief, is quicker yet, and her own gun compels the bully to drop his Colt's. Paul quickly falls in love with Grace, the daughter of the Government agent, and finds his affection reciprocated. Meantime Fawn Heart also falls in love with her teacher, and mistakes his kindly interest in her studies for a deeper feeling. Fawn Heart is an expert with bow and arrow, and Paul has instituted an archery contest as a part of the holiday games. Fawn Heart wins the prize and later puts her skill to good use when Lone Wolf, a member of the tribe, seeks to rob Paul of the money left in his charge by the agent, who is called away on a trip. Paul hears a noise in the school house and enters to engage Lone Wolf in a desperate struggle, which is terminated by Fawn Heart, whose arrow pierces the Indian's wrist. Bravely she learns of the forthcoming marriage of Paul and Grace, but when the merry wedding party has passed from sight she shows that hearts are pretty much the same the world over by sobbing out her sorrow on her father's breast, an effective final tableau to a story of unusual interest.

A CHANGE OF HEART.—Stubbs was a gallant old sport, one of the boys, and all else that is connected with the gay life about town. Mrs. Stubbs takes delight in the societies for the prevention of something, and Stubbs is constantly telling her that he wishes that she was more like herself. Mrs. Stubbs, stung by his frankness of speech, comes to realize that perhaps she is as dowdy as he says she is, and she leaves home after writing Stubbs that he will not see her again until she has made herself over into the sort of woman he prefers. Stubbs is delighted and starts out to celebrate. Mrs. Stubbs, meanwhile, has been shopping. To see her you would swear that she was hopeless, but a transformation is effected before your very eyes, and from the chrysalis of the dowd emerges a radiant and dashing young woman who soon learns to like champagne and rake in the chips at poker. She gains what Stubbs calls "class" with amazing rapidity, and takes delight in the thought of how pleased her husband will be. But meanwhile the Salvation Army has claimed Stubbs for its own, and his earnestness soon gains him promotion to a captaincy. In this capacity he goes to a fashionable restaurant to sell his War Crys, and comes face to face with his missing spouse. It is a trying moment, and both fall fainting into the arms of their friends.

PATHE FRERES.

BETTY AS AN ERRAND GIRL.—Betty is given employment as errand girl at a fashionable milliner's. Her first mission is to deliver to a customer's home an enormous creation that has been purchased, and which is contained in a box about twice as big as herself. On the way Betty lifts the cover of the box, and, momentarily awed into admiration at the magnificence of the hat, gazes silently upon it for a few moments. The next moment it is on her head with her own microscopic sailor hat reposing in the huge box and Betty is marching proudly down the street with the hat box on her arm. Long before her destination is reached she has played a few of her outrageous pranks and has escaped from her victims by hiding in the box. Ultimately she reaches her destination, delivers her sailor hat in its box and leaves with a light step to return to the store

ANOTHER ORIGINAL COMEDY

Hubby wanted wifie to be as good a sport as himself and frankly told her she was a mess. She comes to agree with him and sets out to fit herself to his tastes. She succeeds admirably but meanwhile he has joined the Salvation Army and when they meet they both faint dead away. There is genuine humor of idea to this story and screamingly funny action at the same time. A most happy combination.

The District Attorney's Triumph

The romantic, novel reading girl wanted a Launcelot or an Ivanhoe for a husband and never realized that the man whose proposal she rejected was destined to become a modern hero of equal bravery. But the District Attorney was a hero even though he did not get his clothes at the hardware store and he won a charming wife.

Here's What One Exhibitor Thinks of These Reels:

"I want the reels with the square hole in flanges. These appear to me to be a decided improvement over anything I have seen. They have a metal hub; the unreliable spring for holding the end of the film is eliminated, and the sides seem to be secured so that there is no possible way for them to become detached."—AIRDOME, 5th Ave. and 116th St., New York City.

ATLAS.

THE WRONG BAG. Mr Jenks [illegible] was on a business trip. Mrs Jenks [illegible] good-bye with a parting admonition, "Beware of the fair sex and their wiles." Her fears [illegible] Jenks is a bit of a barbarian and Mrs Jenks [illegible] "stock from with the goods" on several occasions.

Rushing to a railroad station at the last minute, the attendant noise and confusion would cause the most stolid, so Jenks loses his bag and picks up a woman's by mistake.

Meeting a friend and desiring to show him something of which his bag of curiosities [illegible] seldom seen outside "my lady's bower." The friend gives a coarse chuckle and [illegible] in on the joke. Jenks departs [illegible] To be [illegible] and suspected is trying to the extreme.

The lady owner of the bag discovers [illegible] Jenks in the next couple of hours and is determined to abandon the trip. He returns home in a terrible condition. The woman arrives with [illegible] accusing him of stealing the bag, and [illegible] the contents to confirm her statement.

Mrs Jenks "wags with the bush," first she sobs with the woman, then defends "mister," [illegible] becomes hysterical, then engages in a [illegible] battle. The tangle is unraveled to [illegible] Luella at last likewise to the other interested ones. Jenks is received once more into the arms of his family.

THE ANIMATED SCARECROW. Willie Love, although repeatedly warned not to trespass on the farm, persists in making love to the farmer's daughter.

The young pair are again caught by the farmer, who writes Willie for the last time to keep off the farm. Willie presumably leaves and Mary is sent to the house, but watching her chance she again meets Willie in the corn field where the farmer has been building a scarecrow, which is unfinished.

The lovers think themselves secure from observation until Mary sees her father returning; the only feeling place is the unfinished scarecrow. With Mary's help Willie secretes himself in the straw suit, making a very presentable figure. All would have been well and the deceit would have been successful but for a country yokel who witnessed the substitution and informs the farmer of Willie's presence in the figure. The farmer tests the truth of the information by prodding Willie with a hay fork. Willie, who can no longer stand the agony, flees, pursued by the farmer.

In the chase which follows, in hiding behind a bush, he is mistaken by a hunter for an animal of some sort and is shot. Flies, of course, settle him, scurrying along and in climbing a fence falls upon several tramps who are emptying a cask of cider, and from there rolls into the pig-pen, where he straw. Willie, looking like a [illegible] terrible, [illegible] bucks [illegible] a [illegible] cottage meeting, knocks down, a ladder which leaves a [illegible] dangling in a tree, wrecks the [illegible] of some girl campers and, still pursued by the angry mob, [illegible] runs into the river. There, of course, extinguishes the flames, but the mob [illegible] is at last cornered and we see him being led away by a country constable.

YANKEE

THE HEROIC COWARD. John Hunt, protecting his [illegible] sister from the abuse of her dissolute husband, [illegible] him with a blow. John and his sister think the husband has been killed and John is [illegible] by his sister to fly. John leaves the house and has his sister summons a doctor who finds the husband alive but in a serious condition. John [illegible] in a small country town and obtains a position as a clerk in the general store of the village. John makes himself generally liked, especially by Rose Randall, and is generally believed by the children of the village.

John never forget his cause for flight and his [illegible] and cowardice apparently makes him a [illegible] coward. This fact the store loungers soon discover and frequently take advantage of John's nervousness and make sport of his cowardice.

John and Rose become attached to each other and the course of true love runs smooth until Bud Long, the town bully, who considered Rose his particular property until the advent of John, tries to pick a quarrel with him. John, mindful of the result of a previous blow, submitted to Bud's insults and abuse and Rose, thinking John a coward, expresses her contempt and orders him never again to bother her with his attentions.

A scarlet fever epidemic infests the village and the local doctor posts a notice of the fact and proceeds to vaccinate the inhabitants. John in his [illegible] tries to beg off, but the doctor is assisted in his efforts by several of the loungers. John trembles under the operation, exhibiting further evidence of his cowardice to Rose and the other spectators. John bears the loss of the respect of his former friends with fortitude. One of the victims of the epidemic is the small son of Widow Brown, of whom John has been especially fond.

The widow, worn out with the constant care of her boy, needs some one to relieve her at night. The doctor posts a notice in the general store asking for a volunteer, but without success. John without disclosing the fact decides to aid the widow, but on approaching the widow's home for the purpose is prevented from entering by Bud Long, who has been delegated by the doctor to prevent anyone from entering or leaving the house. Bud scowls his obliviousness to John, who thereupon proceeds to administer him a sound thrashing and enters Widow Brown's home through a window.

Meanwhile John's brother-in-law recovers from the blow and the consequence of his former behavior has changed him to a better man. John's whereabouts being unknown, an advertisement is inserted in the papers asking him to return. John's heroism alters the opinion formed by the villagers and when the quarantine is lifted from the widow's home Rose is one of the first to congratulate him.

John visits Rose at her home and while waiting for her to get ready for a stroll, reads the advertisement inserted by his sister. Rose appears upon the scene, John explains and Rose rewards with a kiss—her heroic coward.

THANHOUSER COMPANY.

THE MAD HERMIT. The story centers on Harry Willard, a plodding farmer. A city "gentleman" promises Harry's frivolous wife a life of ease and luxury and it is the old, old story. She takes her tiny daughter, Agnes, with her and leaves a note announcing the fact for Harry.

The young farmer, who loves his wife and child with an all-consuming love well nigh loses his reason as he reads the announcement of his betrayal. Although without the bare means of subsistence he searches for days for his loved ones. And eventually the strain mental and physical, tells on him, he comes out of it all a maniac. His wrath takes the form of an aversion to all mankind. He wants to forget the world that has treated him so ill so decides to become a hermit and betakes himself to a desolate cave, where he spends the years execrating humanity. A quarter century goes by.

Rarely in that time does he venture on beaten paths for fear that he may meet a hated human, but one day he forgets his resolve long enough to cross a carriage drive. He hears the clatter of hoofs and sights a horse tearing towards him with a swaying carriage and screaming occupants runaway. As the carriage flashes past him, a woman in it flings a bundle to him, he catches it and finds it a pink and white bit of humanity. Dazed, he runs into the wilderness with the baby and makes for his cave.

Arrived at the cave the maniac resolves to even his score with society by taking the babe's life. But his eyes light on the babe's locket and his mind is stirred. For the locket bears a picture of the child of the wife who betrayed him.

The torrents of the baby have miraculously restored sanity to the wreck of their carriage and to the strange creature who rescued the child to his lair. They arrive as he ponders on the picture in the locket and tries to recall the original of it. The babe is the child of the original and is mother the hermit's daughter Agnes—the one time to whom the deserting wife took with her. A wife and mother she is a quite mature woman now, but her features are unchanged. The face appears familiar to the hermit and he tries to place it. Eventually he succeeds.

The shock of recognition dazes him—and changes him. The light of sanity returns to his eyes. His reason is restored. He takes to his breast the daughter whom he had lost and found again. She takes him from his forest home and back to the civilization that had treated him. But the kindly care and love that his daughter bestows on him are in a measure as a recompense for the wrong done him in the long ago and with the passing years the bitterness passes from his being. The picture touches the heart strings; it will please to a certainty.

LENA RIVERS. At the opening of the play, Grace Nichols' only daughter is leaving the farm to go to the city in search of employment. We next find her in the city married to a wealthy man who has forbidden her to make their marriage public as he is afraid his family will object. One day, after a year of happy married life to her husband leaves his wife and baby daughter to go down town on business. Through a case of mistaken identity, he is arrested and before he can prove his innocence to the satisfaction of the police his wife believing [illegible] to have deserted her, takes her baby and creeps to her mother. The husband upon regaining his freedom and returning home finds only a note from his wife saying that he will never see her or the baby again. He mourns his loved ones as dead, thinking that his wife left him contemplating the death of herself and her child.

The mother and child return to the farm and there with her dying breath she entrusts her baby Lena to the care of Grandma Nichols. Here on the farm, Lena grows to womanhood never knowing her father's name.

When Lena is sixteen [illegible] Uncle John decides to take his mother to live with him in the city. Granny refuses to leave without Lena, so she also moves to Uncle John's home.

In the meantime Lena's father, a frequent visitor at the home of Uncle John, whom he little thinks is any relation to his dead wife [illegible]

[illegible] Lena and espying [illegible] locket in the pocket of her mother's dress, [illegible] recognize the [illegible] Not [illegible] but lucky Lena is enabled [illegible] her eyes.

AMONG THE ROSES. [illegible] to the world of love but sometimes [illegible] forget it exists. Certain it is that [illegible] one summer a timid and bashful [illegible] Joe Abbott, a lack of wealth and position, does. He realizes a [illegible] of passing years, and in [illegible] the process confusion in which he resides, even [illegible] that the flowers have become less [illegible] and [illegible] from his fortunate [illegible] being absent. In order to catch the thief he disguises himself as a gardener and works on his own estate. One day, just as the last [illegible] twilight are becoming night, he detects someone among the rose bushes, and after watching secretly sees the form of a young girl plucking the flowers. She turns her face to him and in the dim light he is struck with the charm and beauty of her. He approaches her, and taken aback, she starts forward, but after a word of encouragement from him, she draws near. She tells him that she did not realize the value of the roses and has been giving them to the poor and sick. She points out to him that there are thorns as well as roses in the world, and he is so struck with her charitable disposition that he falls in love with her, and thereafter there are fewer roses in the home, but more peace and much love.

THE SENATOR'S DOUBLE. Senator Dickenson is addicted to the morphine habit. He is preparing a speech to be presented in the Senate. He meets a man from his own State who is his exact double and they both are struck at the resemblance to each other. Before he is ready to make the speech in the Senate, the morphine disables him, and he begs his friend to take his place, on the pretext that he is ill and cannot undergo the strain incidental to delivering the address. After much persuasion, the friend consents, and proceeds on his way to the Senate. When the time comes for the speech to be delivered, the bogus senator arises, goes through to the end, and makes his way from the Senate chamber. Of course the entire body understands that Senator Dickenson had make the speech, and has not the faintest idea that he is at home writing under the influence of the deadly narcotic. The friend returns to the Senator's home and finds him dead. He sympathizes with the grief-stricken sister of the senator, and in the course of consoling her, falls ardently in love with her. The last chapter is far away from the chamber of death, grief and pain have vanished and their hearts are filled with the tender love that only the dear old Cupid can instill.

HEARTS OF GOLD. How easily things go wrong, but two short months ago they and all [illegible] so happy. Then Sid was hurt in the [illegible] and through, for the sake of their feeble old grandmother, [illegible] landlord and grocer had been [illegible] kind, now they were growing impatient and Bess saw only one way out of the difficulty—she must get work. Easier said than done, for at each place the girl went she always received the same reply, "We want men, not women."

Returning after a hot, weary search one evening, Bess found Granny at work upon Sid's clothes. "If she only dared." With just a little alteration the things would fit, and then she would be [illegible] gladly accepted wage earner, a man!

Quickly donning the suit, the girl looked at herself in the mirror; but alas and alack, her hair still betrayed her—it was short, curly hair, too—but with a sigh she realized that there was no other way, so, snatching up Granny's big scissors, she set to work—and the next morning an eager-eyed "lad" was quietly stealing out of the house when Grandmother Lucy shouted "Hello." Explanations were reluctantly made, and then, although the old lady begged her granddaughter to give up the wild project, Bess darted out and sped toward the Cooper ranch where she had called the previous day.

Once there and finding that they needed a sheep boy, Bess boldly asserted that was what she could do best, and Jean Cooper, taking the [illegible] at its word, sent him off to the field.

Fine hearty girl found however that being "the split was willing the flesh was weak," and when the day was done, she staggered into the kitchen and tumbled down in a dead faint.

It was then that young Mrs. Frank Cooper with a keener eye than per her self-[illegible] Bess' secret, but upon the girl's entreaties promised to keep silent.

The kiss and embrace of the two women had, nevertheless been silently watched by Frank and the moment his wife left the room he eagerly [illegible] seized the opportunity of telling the [illegible] a good lesson.

Bess managed to beat Jim to the door, but was overtaken upon the hill and in trying to save herself from the quirt, locked of the old [illegible]

ECLAIR.

THE COLONEL'S BOOT.—Pete and Jeanne are devoted lovers and meet on the balcony of their homes, which are side by side. The affair does not meet with the approval of Jeanne's papa, a retired colonel, who drags his daughter from the balcony. Balked of a personal meeting with his divinity, the young man tries to convey a note to her, and drops it, as he imagines, in her shoe. Unluckily the note falls into the colonel's boot by mistake, and the latter is amazed by the sudden affection of his daughter, who tries to persuade him not to go out. He insists, and accompanied by the girl, ventures into the street. The lover's efforts are now all directed towards getting hold of the boot with its incriminating contents. He bribes a water cart driver to pour a flood over the old man's foot. The latter refuses to take off his boot, and so, disguised as a bootblack, he attempts to get the boot off, only to have his face blackened. Success is secured with the aid of two friends, who, disguised as Apaches, seize the colonel and take the boot off by force. The young man rushing up in the guise of a rescuer receives the old man's hearty thanks and the hand of his daughter.

THE MONKEY SHOWMAN OF DJIBAH.—Judging from the number of monkey tamers who make a living in their country, the Egyptians are very fond of the monkey shows. We ourselves must admit these trained monkeys, their intelligence, their clever tricks, their quarrels and battles among themselves have for us a peculiar attraction, and our film bearing the above title is a remarkably clever piece of work and will prove a source of amusement to old and young.

BISON

A TRUE COUNTRY HEART.—Ann's oar slips away from her and in trying to recover it the boat fills with water and over it goes. Hiram, a farm hand, sees Ann's mishap and rushes to her. He carries her to her home, where her mother and father thankfully receive her. Ann and Hiram become engaged and are happy in their love, until Ned, a city fellow, comes to Ann's home as a boarder. His handsome physique and city manners appeal to the country girl and she agrees to his plan of an elopement; so one quiet, starry night she leaves her home to go with him to the unknown, leaving two notes, one for Hiram and the other for her parents. In the morning her mother discovers the letters. The father declares he will never see her again and storms about, but when Hiram gets his note he quietly and sorrowfully accepts the blow. Poor Ann's path is not all roses, and Ned becomes neglectful and is drinking over much. She has difficulty in keeping up with her little baby. She implores him to get no more liquor, but he heeds her not, and after purchasing the stimulant does not return to her. After waiting, and almost starving, she takes her little one and returns to her girlhood home. Her mother is happy to see her child again, but the father remains firm in his resolve and turns her out, bolting the door against her. She bids farewell to her child and leaves it at the cottage door. Again she makes her way to the river, but this time throws herself in its shining depths. Hiram is at hand and saves her despite herself. The mother, hearing the baby's cries, brings it into the room. The sight of it, innocent and helpless, softens the father's heart, and when Hiram brings Ann in, he forgives her and takes her home again.

THE PRAIRIE POSTMISTRESS.—Six one hundred dollar bills mean much to any but the millionaire, still Frank had gotten them together and was sending them home to pay the mortgage. The letter in which the money was enclosed was to be carried by his sister. Two witnesses of the enclosure, Tom Forrest and his partner, decide that they could use the money to advantage and plan to get it. They ask Frank and Gus to join them in a drink, and when refused they are more determined than ever to procure the letter. Grace drives on and is given the mail sack and Frank hands her the letter, telling her it must be delivered at once. Before she starts on her way Tom attempts to make love to her but she soon settles him and his anger mounts higher. She goes about delivering the different papers, letters, etc., and when confronted by Cowboy Dick, she becomes shy and takes some time before going through the mail and telling him there was nothing for him. Tom and his partner have been following Grace and while on a lonely road they hold her up. She lashes her horse and gets by them, but they gallop after her. Her mail flies in all directions and she is finally overcome. Tom secures the letter containing the money and goes off. Some cowboys happening along help Grace on her way, and by chance she is led to Dick's house, where she is cared for by his mother, while he rides away. Tom and his partner halt to gloat over their success, but the approach of horses hastens them on. Here ensues a lively chase between Dick and the cowboys and Tom with his companion. Dick aims and shoots the letter from Tom's hand. Leaving the boys to attend to their captives, Dick rides back to Grace with the letter. She explains its importance, and with his aid she mounts a horse and together they start on her interrupted journey. Meanwhile the poor old couple, to whom the money meant so much, were being turned from their home. The lawyer turned a deaf ear to their pleadings, but Dick and Grace arrive just in time; the money is paid. Tom is brought on. Grace orders that he be let loose and at her request Dick accepts Tom's hand. Dick gets his reward for his kindness, Grace.

LUX FILMS.

THAT TYPIST AGAIN.—Mr. Johnson starts for the office leaving his better half in anything but a pleasant mood, and is refreshed to have a pleasant word with his typist, who certainly appears to be more amiable than Mrs. Johnson just now. That lady has made up her mind to pay Bobbie a visit, "on mischief bent." She is announced. Poor Mr. Johnson has never dared to mention the need of a typist and to avoid "a scene," she is sent to a different room, but a pair of lady's gloves catch Mrs. Johnson's gaze and an altercation commences. Clerks and typist set to work to play a joke on the lady. Disguising himself as the girl, one of the clerks takes the place of the girl at the typewriter. In rushes Mrs. Johnson to find that there is no cause for jealousy with such a countenance as that typist possesses.

ONLY A BUNCH OF FLOWERS.—His watched-for opportunity has come; Jack has followed her and notices the admiring glance at a small bunch of flowers in the hands of a flower seller. Quickly Jack buys the bunch and presents them; a chat follows; the friendship ripens, and we next see them in their home, where a little one has come to share their happiness, but, alas, the mother's health is failing her. Poor Jack spends his all in an endeavor to keep her, but all in vain, and she is at last taken to the hospital, while their child is placed in a temporary home.

Trouble follows trouble, Jack has to leave the home where such happiness has reigned, and on arriving to pay his usual visit to the hospital he learns that his wife has died. In despair he sits on a bench on the roadside. A flower seller also sits down. Jack wishes to buy a posey, but, alas, his pockets are empty. The temptation to steal a bunch comes, but a young lady passing buys a bunch which Jack pleads for. With joy he goes for his little Dot and together they go to the grave, where he hands the child the little posey which she puts on her mother's last resting place.

CHAMPION.

A COWBOY'S PLEDGE.—Mary, fearing that mayhap her lover might follow in the footsteps of her father and become a drunkard, exacts a pledge from him that he will not touch liquor as long as he lives. The father cannot appreciate the seriousness of the pledge and during the festivities of the betrothal coaxes the cowboy into taking just one drink in honor of the occasion while Mary's back is turned. Mary, however, unexpectedly sees the man she is to marry drain the glass. She shudders with fear as she realizes that her lover, not strong enough to resist temptation and weak enough to break his pledge, might take to the path of her father. Her forebodings come true. Her sweetheart and father become constant habitues of "Pete's saloon." Day after day, night after night, both can be found drinking or drunk.

She determines to break off her engagement and signalizes her state of mind when she snubs her fiance when he and her father stagger from the barroom while she and her younger sister are passing on horseback. The old man and the cowboy, after a moment's pause of stupefied consternation, link arms and seek consolation at the bar. It does not take the young fellow long to become a drunken sot.

Indian Joe carries the news of the father's debauch to Mary and her mother. The women mount their horses and gallop to the saloon to save the father and husband and punish the lover. The wife arrives in time to support the head of her dying husband, who has fallen to the floor, and Mary to stare with accusing wrath at the man she was to marry. In an instant she grips her whip, and with well directed blows smashes bottle after bottle to atoms until the place reeks with the odor of spilled liquor. The cowboy at last attempts to stop the frenzied girl in her destruction, but she recoils from him, and before he realizes what she is doing, brings the whip down upon his head, face and shoulders.

After the funeral of the old man Jack goes to see Mary for the purpose of effecting a reconciliation, but she will not listen to his pleadings and he decides to go away and try to atone. She tells him that if in two years he becomes a man and finds he still loves her to come back.

And now the two years are passed and she wonders, as she leans against the tree where they parted, whether he will come back to her. Scarcely has the thought been formed when she hears his steps upon the gravel, and with bursting heart throws herself into the arms of her cowboy lover—come back a parson.

THE POWERS COMPANY.

ALMOST A HERO.—Teddy Holmes is telling his sweetheart, Edith, about his wonderful heroism in rescuing a lady. Edith's brother, Jack, overhears this and puts on a bed sheet, goes into the room and almost frightens the life out of Teddy. The girl sends Teddy away and writes him a letter that she will never marry him until he has proven himself a hero.

Teddy meets some moving picture people. He sees the villain throw the heroine into the water. To the rescue Teddy knocks the villain aside, plunges in after the girl and pulls her ashore. Then the moving picture people do him up thoroughly.

He sees a man and wife quarreling. The man knocks the wife down. Teddy interferes. The husband and wife both pitch into him, and what they do to him is unheard.

Sporty Jones comes home drunk and cannot open the door, so he climbs through the window of his house. Teddy sees this. Now he'll be a hero. He climbs in after Jones and a policeman sees this and he climbs in after Teddy. Teddy grabs poor Jones and is hauling him out when the policeman enters. Teddy accuses Jones and Jones accuses Teddy of being a burglar. The cop doesn't know what to do until Jones' wife enters and accuses Teddy of being the burglar. Then the cop drags Teddy out to the station house.

THE SEWING GIRL.—Hattie Brown is a poor sewing girl, who sews shirtwaists for a "sweat shop." Leaving her invalid mother, the girl goes to deliver her work at the office of the "sweat shop."

Simpson has called to sell some goods to Smith, the proprietor, and he has brought with him his pet dog. Smith leaves his wallet full of money on the desk, and he and Simpson go into the shipping room. The girl enters with her bundle of work, which is received by the clerk who exits and returns with a bundle of unfinished work for Hattie, who takes it and leaves. When the room is empty the dog enters, snuffs around, sees the wallet, grasps it with his teeth and goes out. We see the dog take the wallet to Simpson's house and lay it behind the steps. Smith enters, discovers his loss and calls a detective. As the girl was the only person in the room with the wallet she is suspected. The detective goes to her home and tries to arrest her, but Mrs. McGuire, a neighbor, takes a hand, knocks the detective over and helps the girl escape. An exciting chase follows.

The girl risks her freedom to visit her sick mother. The detective comes in and arrests her. He takes her to the office of Smith, who accuses her and agrees to make a complaint against her.

Meanwhile, we have seen Simpson sitting on the front steps of his house when the dog comes up carrying the missing wallet in his mouth.

Simpson dashes off to Smith's office and arrives just in time to save poor Hattie from arrest. Then Smith squares himself with the sewing girl.

WINNING A HUSBAND.—Nellie Thomas and Frank Howard are in love with each other. Phyllis Black, a school chum of Nellie's, pays her a visit, falls in love with Frank and, at a picnic party in the woods, she throws her arms about him and tells him so.

Nellie's father sees this and, thinking that Frank is trifling with his daughter's affections, orders him to leave the place and never see his daughter Nellie again.

Frank is a Western boy who does not give in quickly. He writes a note to Nellie. "Sweetheart: I love only you. Will you meet me at the cross roads and marry me now?" The stupid messenger delivers the note to the other girl, who, thinking that she is meant, rides off to meet Frank. But she drops the note on the ground and Nellie finds it. Here follows a novel and most interesting race between two women to meet the man they both love.

Nellie passes her rival on the road, meets Frank and they are married. Phyllis comes up just in time to see them receive the minister's blessing.

MADAME CLAIRO.—Thompson picks up an artificial curl dropped by his wife's French maid. Thinking it is his wife's curl he kisses it and is discovered in the act by Mrs. Thompson, who is very pretty and very jealous. She thinks that he is in love with some other woman and she arranges a meeting with Madame Claire, a fortune teller, with the hope of learning who the other woman is. Thompson finds this out, and he bribes Madame Claire to let him wear her robe and take her place at the seance. "Wifie" enters and Thompson gives her the time of her life. After several screamingly funny scenes Thompson says he will show his wife a spirit picture of the man who loves her best. He removes the mask, puts his own face through a picture frame and his wife is convinced.

Meanwhile in another room we see Madame Claire receiving a message warning her to flee as the police are about to raid the place. Claire goes out and the police enter and arrest Thompson's wife, who faints. Thompson comes out. The police arrest him and are about to take him away, when he pulls off the mask and the laugh is on the cops. The wife goes away without seeing her husband, and the last scene where Thompson's wife begs him on her knees to forgive her for her jealous suspicions, is a fervent one.

WHAT IS IT?

It is a better projector carbon, made by men who believe that it pays to do things just a little bit better than the other fellow. They have a notion that there will be enough people who will appreciate it, to make it worth while.

Our stack of mail every morning proves that there are a whole lot of people who think it worth while.

They are the kind we want to hear from.

The chap who says "Oh I'm satisfied; Why should I change?" Grandfather's shoes fit me perfectly"—little knows that the sheriff is waiting just around the corner with a writ of attachment for the above mentioned footgear.

Success to-morrow lies in being everlastingly dissatisfied with to-day's results. At least, we think so, and we are glad to find that we're not at all lonesome in the opinion.

NEW YORK HERALD All of its copyrighted pictures, taken at the ring-side, Reno, Nev., July 4th. We can enable managers, at a minimum figure, to present EVERY VITAL MOMENT of the BATTLE of the great fight at Reno. These pictures were used by the leading newspapers of the country in illustrating the battle. Among the more prominent journals using the Herald's service were the Kansas City Star, the Boston Post, the Philadelphia Inquirer, the Chicago Daily News, the St. Louis Republic, the New York Evening Journal, the New Orleans Picayune, the Atlanta Journal, THE NEW YORK WORLD, and others to the number of hundreds. We have chosen the best of these pictures for exhibition, and will ship by express immediately on receipt of wire

Exactly as seen by the fight fans at Reno.

THE NEW YORK HERALD TOOK OVER SEVEN HUNDRED PICTURES

FIFTY OF THE HERALD'S SELECTED VIEWS OF THE JEFFRIES-JOHNSON FIGHT

Showing all of the interesting stages of the battle, from introductions to the final knockout, and we guarantee them to be the BEST AND ONLY JEFFRIES-JOHNSON FIGHT PICTURES AVAILABLE.

The slides are ready for immediate shipment, and if they do not prove all that is represented, bringing you $10 in returns for every dollar invested, your money will be refunded.

These slides are for absolute sale, at the low sum of $30—FOR EACH COMPLETE SET OF 50 SLIDES—$30

Together with a full description of each slide. We also can furnish you with a full line of Lithographed printing.

THE BILLBOARD said last week: "The pictures which Berger is advertising in THE BILLBOARD are the only other exclusive pictures on the market, and while they are not motion pictures it is anticipated that they will be large in demand as long as the interest in the fight survives." These were prophetic words. Orders are coming in by telegraph and telephone, and by the time this advertisement reaches the public, over 400 sets of the slides will be in use throughout the country. You can be the only by sending in your order NOW, accompanied by certified check, post-office, express money order, or telegraph.

FIRST EXHIBITOR IN YOUR TERRITORY

JUST A FEW COMMENTS

"The best views of the big fight ever shown."—New York Sun. "All of the interesting moments without unnecessary brutal details."—New York Times. "There is no doubt of the public's interest in the big battle, and these pictures satisfy the curiosity without shocking the sensibilities."—New York American. "The greatest pictures of the fight I have seen."—James J. Corbett. "They are great."—Sam Berger, Manager of Jeffries. "Better than any other pictures I ever saw in all my life."—CHAMPION JACK JOHNSON.

POUND THE IRON WHILE IT IS HOT.

Get your order in by wire as soon as you see this advertisement. You can make a few hundred dollars for yourself, and then sell the slides to your neighbor. And if these pictures don't get the money for you, your money will be refunded by us.

'Phone, Murray Hill, 6442 JOHN S. BERGER, Manager, 1386 Broadway, NEW YORK CITY

P. S.—Kindly remember that the NEW YORK WORLD, in order to properly illustrate its articles on the fight, used the NEW YORK HERALD'S picture service, and these pictures now are owned by us, so beware of imitations.

She Stoops to Conquer

Here you have a prize version of the prize comedy of the great Goldsmith—the best known comedy in the English language, in fact. During his liftime Stuart Robson used it as a starring vehicle and brought renewed fame to himself as well as to the play. So revered is "She Stoops to Conquer" in the hearts of the American public that recently it saw an all-star Broadway production with Eleanor Robson as Kate and Kyrle Bellew as Marlow and scored an epoch-making success The present producers don't claim it to be a Broadway production but they DO know it's the best picture thing of its kind that has been released this far in the game. A FILM FABLE —OF THE—
PRESENT TIME

ONCE UPON A TIME a man had a Baby Lion,—a cute little thing that purred and rubbed up against him. He fed it with a Bottle and it waxed Fat and grew BIGGER AND BIGGER. The Man's friends warned him to get rid of the Beast, and were laughed at for their Pains. Finally, the Lion reached its full strength, and its strong claws and powerful teeth were utillized to destroy its Benefactor, aud as it licked its Chops it winked its Eye and chuckled at the GULLIBILITY of Human Nature.

You are feeding a powerful enemy weekly with royalties and rentals. It is HUNGERING FOR YOUR BLOOD AND ALREADY HAS CAST LUSTFUL EYES UPON YOUR THEATRE. Most of the exchanges have been gobbled up, and it is waiting in anticipation the sweet morsel you will supply.

DON'T WAIT FOR THE TEETH TO SINK INTO YOUR NECK BEFORE YOU WAKE UP. Don't feed it another minute.

BE INDEPENDENT: Look at the grand program we are releasing weekly and you won't hesitate a minute. Start the fall season right, and you will be able to sleep peacefully without an axe hanging over your head.

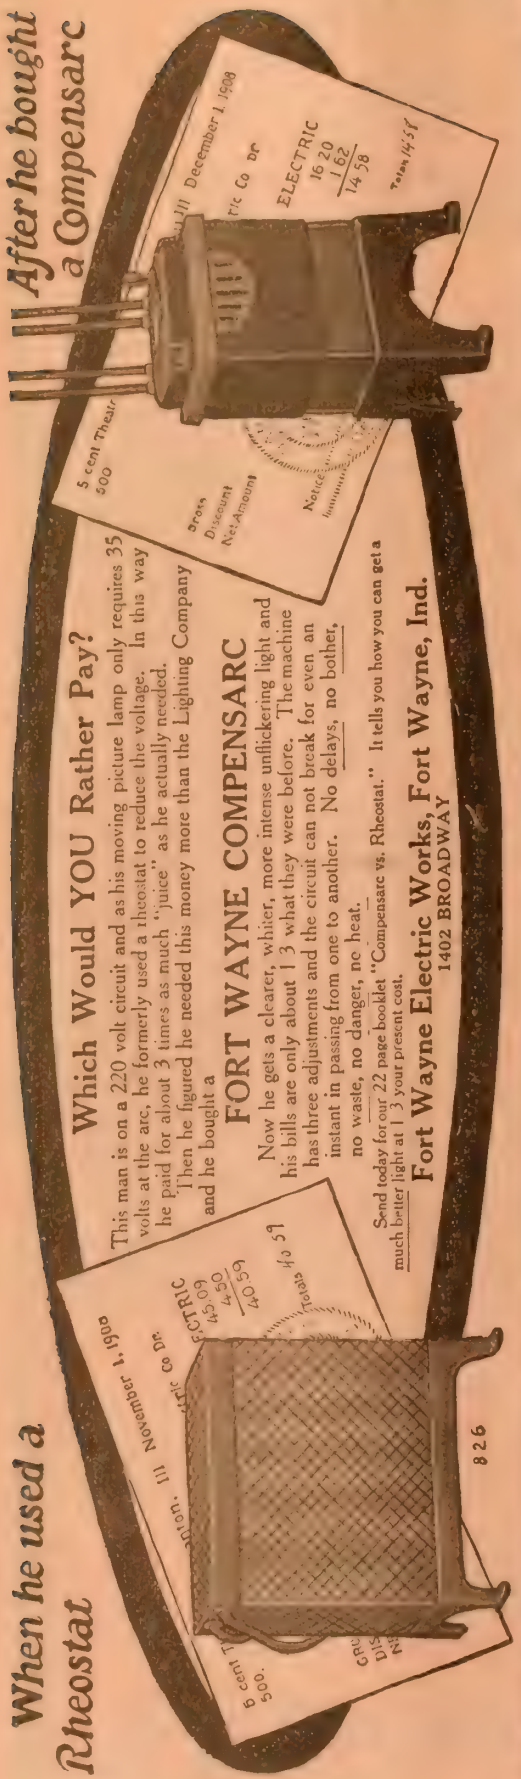
When he used a Rheostat



Which Would YOU Rather Pay?

This man is on a 220 volt circuit and as his moving picture lamp only requires 35 volts at the arc, he formerly used a rheostat to reduce the voltage. In this way he paid for about 3 times as much "juice" as he actually needed.

Then he figured he needed this money more than the Lighting Company and he bought a

FORT WAYNE COMPENSARC

Now he gets a clearer, whiter, more intense unflickering light and his bills are only about 1/3 what they were before. The machine has three adjustments and the circuit can not break for even an instant in passing from one to another. No delays, no bother, no waste, no danger, no heat.

Send today for our 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat." It tells you how you can get a much better light at 1/3 your present cost.

JACK JOHNSON'S OWN STORY OF THE BIG FIGHT

Jack Johnson has spoken into the phonograph his own story, by rounds, of the big fight, at Reno, Nevada, and has posed in street attire for moving pictures to accompany his Monologue.

These pictures can be shown anywhere.

Wherever the fight pictures are barred for any reason, the value and the drawing power of the Jack Johnson pictures are enhanced beyond measurement.

Jack Johnson received $10,000 for making these exclusive pictures and records containing the only authentic and authorized version of the big fight.

Jack Johnson appeared at Hammerstein's Victoria Roof Garden in New York for a three weeks' engagement, receiving $2,500 a week, and packed the house at every performance.

In these talking and moving pictures he gives a complete description of the fight, very much more comprehensive than in his "turn" in the regular vaudeville theatres.

Jack Johnson has just booked a thirty weeks' vaudeville engagement at $3.000 a week.

You are now offered an opportunity to book the same attraction at a price which permits it to be shown at a popular admission charge.

One reel, two 12-inch records. Absolute perfection secured.

This great picture is reproduced by means of the a simple device for running the talking machine and moving picture film in complete and perfect unison.

There are no connections between the projector and the talking machine, the machine being absolutely independent of electricity.

It is so simple that any operator can work it.

No setting of the film in the gate of the projecting machine.

Works perfectly with any make of moving picture projector.

No wiring whatsoever is required. Nothing to get out of order.

No attachments anywhere upon the projector,

This film is run like an ordinary picture direct from the reel.

Re-joined parts or breaks in the film do not affect the synchronism,

Will fill the largest moving picture theatre.

Can be set up in three minutes ready to run.

Complete outfit, including CINEPHONE, furnished with local rights.

Wire today for terms for state, county or city rights.

IMPORTANT NOTICE

The owner of this special picture is a hard-headed business man who realizes that in order to make it an attractive proposition to the various moving picture theatres, film exchanges, etc., throughout the country, it is necessary to dispose of the rights for various localities at reasonable and fair prices. I do not want the earth for local rights. My motto is "Live and Let Live." I am willing to submit a proposition to you that should mean anywhere from 1000 to 5000 per cent. profit to you.

Primary Schools of Crime.

One of the most interesting public meetings that we have been present at in New York City was of a semi-religious character; in fact, it was connected with a great Catholic organization. On the last occasion when we attended the breakfast of this body, we noticed that the members present consisted of eminent judges, lawyers, doctors, architects and other professional men, with a fair sprinkling of visitors drawn from other cities. The speeches were all more or less informal. It happened that the president of the company called upon a friend of ours, who, for many years, was associated with the New York press, to deliver a discourse. Our friend rose and surprised the hundreds of gentlemen present by quietly unfolding before their eyes a copy of a New York morning newspaper marked off into various colored sections. He had, in fact, colored parts of this paper by hand.

"I want," said our friend, "to give the newspaper a character not commonly assigned to it. The newspaper," he continued, "is largely a record of sin." There were several newspaper men present and they looked up with surprised eyes. "I have drawn up," continued our friend, "a list of the principal or common sins. To each sin I have assigned a particular color. I have gone through this newspaper, and where I have found the record of a sin I have given it its appropriate color. Here is the result." He held up and opened the newspaper, and the result was that it was so liberally colored that the sinless parts of the sheets appeared comparatively insignificant.

"The sight to do ill deeds, makes ill deeds done." If the newspaper is a record of sin, it may fairly be regarded as an incitement to sin. But, has anybody of prominence—a clergyman, lawyer, doctor or professor—ever got up in his place or written in the magazines denouncing the newspaper as a primary school for criminals? or as "the crown and summit of all the influences demoralizing the youth of the country to-day, not even the saloon being an exception." Nobody does this with regard to the newspaper; it is only the poor moving picture which comes in for this disgraceful slime of vicious falsity.

An exhibiting friend has sent us a copy of a publication entitled Good Housekeeping, for August. The conductor of this publication has allowed himself (or herself) to degrade it by the printing of an article called "The Moving Picture: A Primary School for Criminals," by William A. McKeever, a professor of philosophy in the Kansas State Agricultural College.

Why a professor of philosophy in an agricultural college should concern himself with the moving picture passes our comprehension. What has he to do with it? Upon the principle of the cobbler sticking to his last, we should have thought his business was to teach philosophy to agricultural students. Not having minded his own business, but having the temerity to pose as a critic and censor of the moving picture, this professor of philosophy has made an egregious ass of himself. We seriously doubt if he has ever visited half a dozen moving picture shows in his life. Anyhow, he filled two pages and a half of the magazine, Good Housekeeping, with one of the most absurd rhodomontades against the picture that we have ever read. Here is one extract from this stupid screed, which will give the reader an idea of the general tenor of the article, which goes on to say that the picture undoes the work of the schools, and then proceeds to discuss the possibility of "reforming" the moving picture business from the point of view of those who want to make the moving picture "one of the most powerful agencies for the moral or spiritual uplift of any community":

"These moving pictures are more degrading than the dime novel, because they represent real flesh-and-blood forms, and impart their lessons directly through the ses. The dime novel cannot lead the boy farther than his limited imagination will allow him to go, but the moving picture forces upon his views scenes that are new. That is, they give him first-hand experience. Let us not try to annihilate it," continues this good-natured philosopher, "but try to transform it into what it ought to be."

What kind of world, we wonder, does this poor man live in? Does he think that such honorable firms as the Edison, Biograph, Selig, Vitagraph, Kalem, Lubin and Essanay Companies, together with the Imp, the Bison and other firms engaged in the business, does this man really think that these firms are engaged in putting on the market pictures which, to quote him: "practically institute a red-light district in easy reach of every home. See the murders and the debauchery while you wait. It is only a nickel." Does this man really believe what he writes, or is he, what we charitably suppose, profoundly ignorant of the moving picture business? If he believes what he writes he is either a fool or a lunatic. If he is ignorant, he has no right to come out in a popular magazine and issue this atrocious slander on the picture.

We shall take care that this professor, W. A. McKeever, shall receive a copy of this number of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD with this article. We shall also take care that the publication, Good Housekeeping, receives a copy. We shall expect McKeever to retract and Good Housekeeping to publish his retraction. There is no more justification for this wholesale slander than there would be for saying that William A. McKeever is an exponent of immoral lessons to his students, and that the Kansas State Agricultural College is notoriously a red-light edifice. Now, Professor, on your knees, please, and beg the pardon of the industry that you are maligning and the public you are affronting with your misstatements and exaggerations!

The Personal Equation.

In the clean-cut system of modern American life, personality counts for much, if not all. Mr. Roosevelt, probably one of the greatest men the United States has ever produced, not long ago remarked that America was the only country where "a man as a man had every chance that a man should have." What he meant to say was that he is tried and judged on his merits as an individual, irrespective of birth, ancestry, favor or any other concomitants of life which tend to cloud, or, we should say, confuse, the opportunities of the individual. In other words, Mr. Roosevelt stands for the personality of the individual,—the true republican spirit. We prefer, in this article, adopting an older formula, and to call it "the personal equation." In so doing we unite the old with the new. "The personal equation" and "personality" mean the same thing.

The personal equation means everything in the business which it is the object of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD to promote. Everything depends upon the individual. Addressing the exhibitor, we say that the success or failure of his business depends entirely upon himself, or, in every-day language, upon the manner in which he conducts his theater. If there is a suitable personality dominating a moving picture theater, success will inevitably follow. Such a man must take an interest in his business; he must like it for itself, irrespective of the dollars and cents which it is his object to acquire. There is, to our regret to observe, not so much of the favorable personal equation as we should like to see in the moving picture business. Men come in, and men go out of it, simply regarding the picture as a speculative agency. They do not seem to realize that the picture is a permanent factor of modern entertainment life. They mostly look upon it as an easy or ready means of temporarily making money. They may be, and probably are, successful for the time being, but Nemesis generally awaits them, in that having made a little money and cleared out, they are sorry that they did so. They have their punishment in that they see other men who have a firm faith in the picture going on from month to month, from year to year, profiting by their labors in the moving picture field.

The moving picture is not an evanescent factor in life; it is a permanent factor, just as much as the bread we eat, the clothes we wear, the vehicles in which we ride, etc., etc. In those other branches of work the personal equation counts. The insistence, the persistence of the individual makes for permanent success, because men who conduct those businesses have put their hands to the plow and don't look back. In so doing they make for success throughout.

The lesson we want to teach in this article is this: That the favorable personal equation or personality in the moving picture business makes for success. We want each exhibitor who reads this article to take a personal interest in the conduct of his house, and not to delegate the responsibilities to hands that may be unfitted for handling the reins of control. There are, as we know, 12,000 or so moving picture theaters in the United States. Some say that we underestimate the number. We have recently heard that there are as many as 30,000 or more theaters or other places of entertainment where the picture is shown. Even so, if the latter large number is correct, what a great thing it would be for the business if there were 30,000 men or corporations controlling these theaters or other places, in which each one of them "put himself" in the business, or, in other words, ran the business for all it is worth by striving to give the public of their very best in the way of service, courtesy and other accessories of the picture. An uplift indeed!

Within the last few days we have had visits from exhibitors from parts of the country, remote from New York City. They are successful men, prosperous men, conscientious men. Right here in this office we have had the pleasure of talking with them, and we have been pleased to learn that they are personally interested in the picture—and by personally interested we mean that the personal equation is allowed to enter into their business, because they study their patrons and they study the picture, and endeavor to give the public the best they can. They do not regard the picture as a mere arithmetical gambling factor, just as a man who makes his money or his income out of the stock exchange. To him the mere rise or fall of the stock is just the fluctuation of a market fraction, the mere movement of a figure; he has no direct interest in the business which produces these arithmetical fluctuations. He is a mere sport or a gambler. His personality or personal equation does not enter into the matter.

Far different should it be with the moving picture business of the United States, we might say of the world. We think it our duty at the close of August to write this article especially for the edification of the moving picture exhibitor. We want to see him prosperous now and always. We want him to give his public of his best in the way of personal service, attention, creature comforts and the like. The public will come again and again if they find that the presiding genius of a theater is in touch with them, is studying them, that the personal equation of the proprietor or manager is being exercised at its best, and that the public is not being treated as a flock of sheep by an unsympathetic shepherd.

A Black List.

In one of the publications with which we were formerly associated, we felt obliged, in the interests of thousands of those on whose behalf the publication existed, to institute what we called a black list. This black list was nothing less than a record of those unmitigated crooks who made it their business to defraud, deceive, or otherwise act improperly towards the advertisers in the publication. These advertisers, we may say, were poor employees, comparable to the operators in the moving picture business. They advertised in our publication for situations, and it was a rule for them to submit specimens of their work. It was no uncommon thing for an employer answering these advertisements to retain the poor advertiser's specimens of his work. He was thereby prevented from getting employment.

So we started this black list. Whenever we got authentic evidence of a man defrauding these poor workers, we pilloried him by publishing his name in the paper as a warning and a deterrent. For he not only injured the individual employee, but he injured the business generally by his injustice towards an individual.

This black list had a very salutary effect. It punished evildoers. They feared our action, and so in the course of time these pernicious practices of specimen stealing dropped off. It is no uncommon thing for a publication, issued across the Atlantic, to protect its advertisers against the nefariously inclined. We observe with pleasure that one newspaper published in New York City—"The New York Times"—does its best to exclude fake advertisements, and to protect both its small as well as large advertisers against would-be fraudulent persons.

But, in considering this article, we have not the advertising aspect of things in mind. We take rather a broader view. In the interests of the moving picture business as a whole, we seriously contemplate instituting a black list. On that list we shall print the names of prominent persons or newspapers who systematically malign the moving picture. A reference to our past two or three volumes will show that had our black list been in existence all along, we should have had to place on it the names of very prominent people, such as judges, doctors, lawyers, legislators, publishers, authors, newspapers; the list, indeed, would have been quite a formidable one.

If we decide to adopt this drastic measure of defending the picture from the attacks of the ignorant, the unscrupulous and the unjust, we will have just a simple heading in the text part of the paper, indicating that the people whose names are mentioned below are deserving of obloquy at the hands of the moving picture public for libeling, maligning, defaming the moving picture. We should see that copies of the paper containing that list were sent to the entourage of each individual, and by that means we should hope to convince the individual, and his or her friends, of the gross injustice which they were doing to the poor man's entertainment of the United States, if not of the world.

We shall think over our black list proposition. We are determined to exercise every means in our power to defend the best interests of this great and growing industry and form of amusement. We get hot under the collar when we read the nonsense that is printed about the moving picture and its effects. Before us are several clippings which make us laugh, nay, not laugh, but almost angry. Here is a girl who is alleged to have gone wrong in mind because of a love episode in a picture. Another youth is alleged to have imitated only too successfully a form of suicide shown in a moving picture. We say, "Not proven." Are not these things more manifestations of that newspaper neurasthenia which we pilloried a few weeks ago? Why drag in the picture on every possible provocation? The imagination of the American reporter we know is limitless. He is permitted considerable license in the exercise of his duties. But the importance of the moving picture industry is such that we must deny the young man somewhat of this license, although we may not deprive him of his liberty. If we start our black list, those who suffer from the boycotting that will thereby be created will have only themselves to thank for what they bear. In these enlightened times, people who go out of their way to wantonly attack the picture, as such, deserve all they get.

Theater "Hash" on Broadway, New York.

Legitimate curiosity led the writer to visit the theater on Broadway and Thirty-first street to see the afternoon performance. We are sometimes told that theaters give what the people need; had it not better be taken for granted that the people have to take what the theaters give—it certainly seemed so in this instance, for it would be better to think that the few in charge, rather than the many in attendance, were guilty of such bad taste. Vaudeville, circus tricks and moving pictures, what a mixture, and of what a stamp, this, too, in the heart of New York. It is at least pleasing to record that the moving pictures proved the best part of the "show," and even these could have been improved with either a better machine or a better operator. A film by Pathe depicting a love scene and suicide was spoiled from the beginning because the title was unreadable. "Picturesque Waters of Italy" were exceedingly poor for reasons stated above—we have seen better work by the stereopticon. Whether a better adjustment was secured or perhaps the operator suddenly became careful, but "The Death of Michael Grady" proved very good in every way. This is a very well acted comedy and is a good illustration of how "gossip will kill," but Michael, like truth, wouldn't stay killed. The "Water Cure" is a very good laugh raiser, its ridiculous impossibilities provoking much mirth. "Red Eagle's Love Affair" is another good film, well acted and clearly shown. There seems to be a moral to this drama to the effect that it is hard to change our nature, as Red Eagle goes back to his own people and old life even after having been to college. Interspersed with these pictures were a circus sort of troupe with wire walking and jugglery, the only good thing beside the pictures; a sort of clog dancing, which in itself may have been clever (the writer does not know); some singing, and two monologues, each by a young lady, and each containing for its telling "hit" that which bordered the obscene and indecent. What unsavory hash, some good meat spoiled with biting spice and garlic so that what could be relished was digested but a bad taste was left in memory's mouth.

What is the matter? If it is cheap move it to a cheap place—the Bowery or Coney Island—but on Broadway, never. If better talent costs more, charge more; a clean, up-to-date moving picture place ought to be worth 25 cents on one of the main thoroughfares of the United States. What a travesty, a 10-cent jumble of cheap vaudeville with a few good pictures to save its reputation and give it character in the very center of the Metropolis of America. It really seems that our film manufacturers may have to protect themselves by refusing to allow their productions to be debased by such vulgar associations. We could take our families to see the pictures, but should not want them to hear the vaudeville.

Rev. W. H. Jackson.

The Elusive Quality.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

I recently sat through a two-hour show of mixed vaudeville and pictures to review for the Moving Picture World a picture play which promised to be a superior one, which, at least, was an ambitious effort. At the end I felt that there was little of value I could write concerning this presentation, either to the producer, or to the public, so I resolved to say nothing at all.

While thinking it over, it occurred to me that the play I went to see and criticize had a weakness shared by nineteen out of twenty that appear on the canvas.

It failed to get beyond the canvas.

It failed to reach the audience.

The audience was all right. It was composed of human beings with emotions we all share, feelings that could be stirred if any sort of sympathetic interest was aroused.

I sat among the other common people and felt, as they did, a sense of relief when the last scene was shown, the lights were turned up and the next vaudeville act was announced.

On another occasion I sat among the common people when an uncommon play was exhibited, cried with them and laughed with them over a picture play that swept a strong hand across the harpstrings of human emotions, bringing forth a wondrous harmony of pathos and humor in the twenty minutes allowed such representations, and, at the end, there was a sharp crash of spontaneous applause all over the house.

Ordinarily, we sit patiently through a string of dull scenes, hoping and hoping that some spark of genius will light up the gray monotone, but there is no relief. We are ready to respond to situations of sorrow with reciprocal interest and swift indrawing of breath, ready to laugh over faults that we share and recognize privately but do not publicly admit, all because we are simply human.

We all like human plays, the kind that cross the footlights, but picture plays often (O, so often), fail to "get over."

It is an art to photograph a pictured scene.

It is an art to create the scenic picture to be photographed.

Nearly all producers seem to have a thorough knowledge of these two arts. They have acquired that much knowledge and stopped there. Because they go no further, the great majority of silent dramas fall flat.

It seems to me, and I am only giving my impressions as a lover of fine motion pictures, that these silent dramas might be made a power to work on the human spirit so as to afford us fellows in the audience some genuine pleasure. That's what we go to the show for. Some of us need relief, others would like a play that acts as a stimulus to thought. We want something that exerts a strong influence on the mind. It may stir our emotions, it may better our point of view, it may simply entertain, but we object to sitting through a weary round of nothingness. The opening of chestnut burs, the working up of old plays and stale fiction, can be forced on us for a while, but we prefer action to sub-titles. Very few of us are interested in remote questions set forth in the classics, especially when we have questions of our own to deal with in every-day life. The wrongs of other races and other peoples are too remote. Over six hundred children died in New York City last week from lack of fresh air and sufficient nourishment. There are terrible tragedies now, here and right in our midst. Such mortality among the sweetest creatures on earth, presents a problem filled with suggestion. The playwright who shows the joys and sorrows of these tiny creatures, so much loved and so greatly wronged, will stir the hearts of common people.

Then, how about the mothers?

Many of those noble creatures, the most valuable of any on this earth, carry their burdens of sorrow in abject poverty, while selfish decadents hoard what they do not need. Their bravery, their trials, their self-abnegation—we do not have to go far afield to find heroines who are already entrenched in our natural affections.

Make the plays more personal and less theatrical.

Dramas of the highest quality, presenting character contrasts, the clash of intense individualities, the conflict of opposed interests, need not keep within all the unities, but they will more surely meet with appreciation if they deal with existing conditions in our own times.

We can judge of the truth of what is happening here and now.

I do not mean that plays must be limited to simple themes. The one already referred to as a notable success handled a question of abnormal psychology, but was so clearly presented that no sub-titles were really needed. It was instantly appreciated by the entire audience, and it worked on the emotions because it afforded the actors tremendous opportunity.

I do mean that there should be less straining after effect.

It is theatrical artificiality that robs nineteen out of twenty plays of that elusive quality, well known and carefully studied by professional writers, verisimilitude.

The picture dramas lack likelihood.

Noble historical dramas, depicting battle scenes, may not be of to-day, but they should be fair to the enemy; the bravery was not all on our side. Those relating to the civil war should especially be just to the losing side. Theirs is all the after-burden of misery. We of the North came home with joyous bands and flying banners, while our own kith and kin in the South, after long years of self-sacrifice, carried broken hearts back to wasted lands and wrecked homes.

To be truthful, we must be fair.

As to the men appointed to read and judge plays, it sometimes seems as though well organized business concerns, devoted to the manufacture of films, overlook the fact that the reader who has the power of elimination is, in reality, an art director, who dictates the policy of the entire organization. If such men are not qualified by experience to judge, or lack imagination necessary to "see" what the author intends, every cog wheel in the business mechanism has been carefully set in its proper place and the mainspring omitted altogether.

The best training for a man in such a position is a constant study of other productions, with a keen eye on the audience to note how they are received. By getting down among the people, the art director will lose nothing but his time, and he will gain in general knowledge of human kind,—his own kind.

He may even discover in our bosoms "the forgotten power that slumbers in every soul," recognition and love of the truth.

Baltimore and the Picture.

By Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

Baltimore, the gateway of the South, is noted for many things, such as the little flights of marble steps in front of the houses, which are always kept clean by the Baltimore housewife. In Baltimore, too, the housewife gives her guests fried chicken, a distinct novelty to us. Baltimore is very fond of terrapin, so we are told, though, we did not taste this delicacy in this city. We had had enough of turtle soup in London.

On a Sunday, too, Baltimore, unlike New York, is quite dead in the matter of public entertainment. This is curious, inasmuch as Baltimore is a great Catholic center, being the home of the illustrious Cardinal Gibbons. Besides being a city of peace, calmness, pretty women, irregularity of construction, Baltimore is also notable for the humorous fact that the undertakers are very quarrelsome. They quarrel in long and amusing advertisements in the newspapers. One man takes up half a column in the newspapers to advertise the numerous advantages of his $75.00 funeral, whereupon another man gets out, indirectly abuses the $75.00 man, and offers to do the job for $50.00. Funny is hardly the word for this remarkable aspect of modern commercialism.

Shortly described, therefore, Baltimore is just a simple little semi-Southern, easy going, scattered village of half a million or so inhabitants. But it has one supreme recommendation in our eyes, which will always make us turn to it with feelings of warmth and gratitude. It loves the picture, respects the picture, encourages the picture as such. It denied admission to the Jeffries-Johnson photographs, for Baltimore is towards the South, where persons of color are not permitted to take undue liberties with white people.

We were interested to learn by word of mouth, and to have the evidence, that Baltimore is laudably particular in the quality and class of subject which it tolerates in its picture houses. The latter are patronized by the very best local society. On our visit to the city last week we made it a point in the limited time at our disposal to study many audiences in and out of the theaters, and of meeting individual members of those audiences. These people were quite classy enough for the Metropolitan or Manhattan Opera House, New York City. We were impressed by the circumstance that in the character of the people who visited the picture houses in Baltimore, the picture is dignified as a valuable factor in the entertainment of the best classes of the public.

Some of the Baltimore picture houses are amongst the finest and most comfortable in the country. They are administered with tact and ability. Just imagine now one charming little place that we visited, called "The Blue Mouse," an Independent theater, already described and illustrated in our pages, giving for five cents the privilege of a waiting room for ladies, with telephone, writing facilities, and the like. It is this sort of thing which uplifts the picture and attracts the better classes of people. Some of the clerical and other antagonists of the picture should visit these Baltimore houses, and see for themselves how well conducted they are.

"Moving Picture Row," Baltimore (it is called, we believe East Baltimore Street), has all the aspects of Fourteenth Street, New York City. It is crowded with theaters, possibly overcrowded. Competition and the survival of the fittest will no doubt remedy a state of things which is possibly not profitable all round. In all large centers of population there is a tendency for places of amusement to congregate together, due to the fact that the pleasure section of a city bears a certain definite relation to the other sections. The result is excessive competition—a condition of things not unknown in the moving picture field to-day. The shrewd man, however, the money-making man, gets away from the center of things, and therefore makes his money because he does not seek the competition which robs him of the profits he makes. Baltimore, therefore, in this respect is as human as all other cities.

We made it our business to study the Independent aspect of things in Baltimore. The officials of the Sales Company should know that there is room for an increase of their popularity there. The programme put out from Fourteenth Street is, according to our Baltimore informants, not qualitatively and intrinsically up to the mark. We are quoting representative exchange men and theater men. The foreign element in picture making is not liked there, or perhaps we ought to say, not understood. Personally we are not surprised at this. However, European matters in the United States are notoriously caviare to the general. The scheme of life in this country excludes all definite recognition of extraneous affairs, or perhaps we should say trans-Atlantic and trans-Pacific affairs. That is why foreigners and foreign productions are more foreign in the young United States today than they are in the older countries of the world.

Baltimore likes the Imp and the Bison pictures. But Baltimore thinks that both might improve in photographic quality. Baltimore is very critical, and properly so, for culture is rife there.

We heard some plausible complaints against some of the Independent manufacturers who are using raw stock which does not last so long as it should. A prominent exchange man complained to us very strongly that he could only get a fortnight's work out of the pictures. He is a large buyer, and he counts for much in the game. It would, we think, be wise for the directors and executive of the Sales Company to take cognizance of these complaints. For what is felt in Baltimore is felt in other large centers of picturedom. We are anxious—very anxious—that the presiding personalities on the Independent side of moving picture making should realize that their end of the business is not so firmly established as it might be, in virtue of the fact that qualitatively they are not yet "delivering the goods." Every city in the Union says this. Baltimore said it with no uncertain voice.

Let us in conclusion say that we were very pleased with our visit to Baltimore, short though it necessarily was. With true Southern hospitality our friends there tried to kill us with kindness. Indeed, it required something like a physical effort on our part to break away from the many friends we possess in the charming State of Maryland. In passing we noted that our friend, Lyman H. Howe, was due in Baltimore this week. The city was well posted with huge sheets giving Mr. Howe's portrait. This shows him, as we know him to be, a very handsome man. Baltimore we hear takes kindly to Howe. It is one of those cities that unquestionably supports and upholds the picture as it deserves to be upheld and supported. It looks for good American subjects, clean in theme, elevating in sentiment, and perfect in photography.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE SCENARIO.

While the story is not everything in a motion picture, the most clever acting and the most perfect settings will not carry the production and will not impress an audience, if the scenario is weakly constructed or incorrect in certain points.

We have few good scenario writers, because the low prices offered are no inducement to men and women who can not only think of a good story but can arrange same to make it a lifelike production. We have too many scenario writers who are merely imitators. They see a moving picture that appeals to them; they go home to write an imitation, and as they lack the stage and camera experience, they commit blunders.

"An Unexpected Reward" has a good bottom as a story, and if the manufacturers had added one or two more scenes, to make a full reel instead of 750 feet, they would have an excellent production, with the necessary thrilling sensation to arouse the sympathy of an audience.

The girl is rescued from the water by a stranger. In her struggles she loses her bracelet. When the loss is discovered, her lover, jealous of having been a coward, tries to accuse the rescuer of stealing the bracelet. All this is O. K. Why not continue the story? Why not have the rescuer arrested? Why not have the rescuer's friends try to save him, by hunting and diving for the bracelet? We would then have a very pathetic scene of a man falsely arrested, as a reward for his heroic act. Then we would have the friends to dive in the water, find the bracelet and establish the innocence of the rescuer, making him still more worthy of the girl.

No, the scenario writer allows the false accusation to remain, yet without prosecution. When the rescuer returns the bracelet he is accused by the lover of having stolen the jewel for the sake of a reward. He refuses the reward. This is very natural, otherwise he would give ground to the accusation. The question remains, how a father, a mother, a girl would consider the courtship of a man accused of stealing the bracelet and of giving color to the accusation by returning the bracelet only after the reward appeared in the papers, and this without any proof or witnesses to show that he had dived for and found the bracelet in the water. The carriage scene could have been eliminated and advantageously replaced by an arrest, a scene of the friends diving for the jewel and proving the rescuer's innocence.

It is regretable that the master production of the Vitagraph Company, "Uncle Tom's Cabin, III.," should be marred by even a slight inattention. The clever acting, the splendid settings, kept the audience in suspense, and every spectator admired this lifelike drama until we reached the "fake" scene of the flogging of Uncle Tom. This incorrect scene dispelled the charm, and the spectators realized for the first time that they were not witnessing a real life drama but were treated to a faked affair. As the slave-owners had to supply the clothing, it seems very unnatural that a shirt would be ruined at the whipping post. Slaves were flogged on the bare back. Then the way the lash is administered in the picture, any man could stand one thousand blows without the least discomfort. It gives the whole thing away.

It is my belief that the Vitagraph Company, fearing objection from the Board of Censorship, faked the scene. The Board of Censorship should have ordered the suppression of the whipping scene, because if it was a mockery, the barbarous intention was nevertheless there. As it is, if the Vitagraph Company were to cut out this scene they will find that they will add more value to their master production. The last scene is splendidly acted and would leave a deep impression on the mind, if the audience had not fresh to the memory, that Uncle Tom is not dying, is not seeing a vision of Little Eva, but is "faking" death, as he "faked" at the whipping post. Let us hope that the Vitagraph will accept these remarks as they come from a sincere heart and are made for the good of the industry. MARCO.

NEW THEATER FOR THE BRONX.

On or about September 1, 1910, a new theater, "The Comet," will be opened at 1013-1015 Boston Road, corner 165th street, by "The Interborough Amusement Company." Victor D. Levitt, president; Adolf Bauernfreund, treasurer and manager. It will be a high-class vaudeville and moving picture house with a continuous show from 2 p. m. to 11 p. m.; of course it will be a 10-cent house. The building is nearing its completion and will be fitted up with the latest improvements; it has a frontage of 47 feet and a depth of 96 feet; the height inside is 20 feet, with a height of stage of 25 feet. It has a grand ventilation—a large skylight, and six revolving windows (three on each side). The theater will embody all the latest improvements.

THERE IS EVERYTHING IN A NAME.

What the Essanay Contest Means.

"What is in a Name?" Everything! is the right answer. The power of a name is as great as the power of the mightiest nation ever known. Character and worthiness are the most potent factors in the world and a name which is indicative of, or possesses these qualities is a name to be respected or honored as the occasion requires. In the national political, commercial, financial or religious worlds, names stand as guides and bulwarks of assurance, safety and strength.

Shakespeare says "He who steals my purse steals trash, but he who robs me of my good name, robs me of that which enriches him not and leaves me poor indeed," thereby confirming Solomon who said—"A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches," for riches may vanish but a good name stands. On the other hand we are helped again by the proverb which says—"Give a dog a bad name and hang him." being a true indication of what a bad name leads to.

With these truths in mind it is of paramount importance that the proposed new name resulting from the "Essanay Contest" shall bring forth one that shall fill all the requirements indicated above, for the character, yea the very life of a business is going to be helped or prejudiced by the result.

We have no fears that the competent judges deciding this important matter will allow anything either "slangy," "trashy" or "free and easy" to pass them, as doubtless they will have a good sized waste paper basket at hand for such suggestions. Neither must the new name be ambiguous or clouded in the verbiage of too technical or "dead language" origin. True it may find its roots in the best depths of the ancients, but its growth must be in the clear atmosphere of the modern. We look then for a clean, good, ennobling name, one saying what it means and meaning what it says; easily, and, if possible, universally understood, lest its good be lost in translations. We believe the result of this contest is awaited with great interest everywhere in the moving picture world.

CENSORSHIP NEEDED FOR THE NEWSPAPERS.

By Mrs. Ida Jackson, Chicago.

Are moving pictures of prize fights an immoral lesson to our children? May be. The question presents itself whether the sensational articles published in our daily papers are not more injurious to the young.

Can anyone imagine more blatant inconsistency than that displayed by the Hearst syndicate of papers in particular?

If the motion pictures have their faults, we must admit that for one bad or questionable production we have at least fifty moral, elevating and educating pictures, while the daily papers are mostly "yellow" sheets, digging all the time for "sensations and scandals" to cultivate the morbid passions, and this inculcated by them in the minds of their readers.

If in the low districts of our large cities we find a class clamoring for sensational pictures, we cannot deny the fact that even the best daily papers could not keep up their circulation if they had not scandals and sensations to fill their columns.

While the fighters were in training and preparations were made for the big event, the newspapers overlooked the question of morality and of decency but kept the interest alive by publishing daily reports of what was taking place in the training camps. Even to add a little ginger to the affair, they have circulated certain incorrect rumors so as to have a chance to fill more columns the next day to contradict the rumors or publish new facts. All this was done to keep the interest alive and force the sales of the papers.

On the day of the fight the papers had no conscience on the brutality of the affair; no, they were busy making money in selling extras after extras. As long as the papers could make some money from the fight they never questioned the moral or decent side of the question.

The following day, when the newspapers could find nothing of real interest to say on the fight, there came the reaction and they tried to pose as "angels" in starting a war, condemning the exhibition of prize fight pictures.

How long will the newspapers maintain this crusade for purity? Not very long. The present fuss will slowly die out, the daily papers will forget their flaming editorials and at the next prize fight, their pages will be illuminated with big display type, telling you all about the new contest. Yes, the desire to make money with such a sensation as a prize fight will dampen the good intentions of our editors.

If prize fight pictures should not be shown to our children we should have a censor board to keep the newspapers from publishing such disgraceful stories, as:

A minister of the Gospel abandons his wife and children.

A female church member elopes with the minister.

The wife of the minister is a drunkard. (The excuse.)

The children taken by the minister disappear. Have they been murdered by the minister or by his female companion?

The minister and his fair eloper live in adultery.

The minister commits suicide.

All this is to be found on the first page of one of the Chicago leading papers—"The Tribune" of July 21, 1910, under the title of "Pastor Elopes and Ends Life."

Pictures of a prize fight can be brutal and disgraceful to the white race; to see a colored fighter whip a white man; yet the pictures are free from immorality. On the other hand, is it a good lesson to show to our children, citizens and Christians, the slur and mire to be found behind the church doors?

How can a child go to Sunday school and believe what is told him, when he reads in the daily papers that the sweet teachers, the female voices of the choir, the good Aid Society ladies, etc., are there merely to wait a chance to kiss the dear pastor or to elope with him? Can a child have any faith when folks preaching religion act in such a manner? No. The daily papers should know better and when such cases come up, they should be kept under cover and not treated in a sensational manner in the papers, for the sake of selling more copies. Is it a moral lesson to show a minister abandoning his wife on the mere ground that she is a drunkard? If he was a true minister it would be his duty to stick to his poor wife and try to reform her. Is it a moral lesson to show the minister eloping and living in adultery with a woman church member? Where are the children? Has the minister added murder to his already many crimes?

MUTTERINGS FROM THE MAN IN THE STREET.

Love of pictures is engrained in us, whatever our color, race, or age; whether the cabalistic carvings of the ancient Egyptians, the rude scrawls of the savage, or the glories of Titian, the picture has always appealed to the eye, impressed the mind and taught its lesson to humanity. The church—whatever its name—in stained glass or missal, knew this, and used it; but when the pictures became animated, then the attraction became greater; the field of influence immensely enlarged.

Oratory has impressed thousands, the press hundreds of thousands, the moving picture millions, and that in a way the others do not, reaching out amongst all races, stirring all grades from the old to the young. The mighty pulpit of this day, for good or for evil, is the moving picture.

But the moving picture is a factor that is having a very great influence, especially upon the young. Only the other day, in front of my house, some children enacted a story which had been shown during the week in the neighborhood. The sad part of it was that the robbery of a father by a son, and worse still by the wife, under atrocious conditions, was glorified, and this film was put out by a well-known concern. By moving around amongst audiences one hears the intense interest taken in the picture—not the saucy complacency of an orthodox congregation, nor the blazing fury of the fanatic, but the whole-soul human interest in the realities of life. How often have we heard the tense cry—not by children—"They'll be caught!" "He'll get away!" or the yells when the flag comes on or when an honest man is suddenly delivered. We may all be humbugs, but tucked away in a corner is the hope that right may in the end prevail. The good moving picture brings this to the top.

I am not a preacher, or a reformer, but I want to see such potent forces directed right for humanity's sake. My rooted impression is that the editors of the scenarios do not always realize what they are doing. Night after night we see stories that aim at nothing—stories that bear evidence of having been passed by men or women who know but little of mankind, and who have not much evidence of education—stories as ancient as Æsop's fables, with a new hat and an up-to-date frock put on, and we have a new film. We go to the moving picture show to be amused, but we can also be instructed. But not if the operator will not give us the title of the story at the outset. I understand that the operator is not to be blamed for this, but the manager who runs a worn out film because it is cheap. A few days ago I saw film after film without name or title, and on going out I asked the manager what was the title of one subject. He frankly confessed that he did not know, nor even was he able to give the maker's name. A short time ago I took a party of Central Americans to a good show, as I thought. The little sub headings flashed by like lightning. The scene was supposed to be in Russia. I was asked if they did that in the United States.

What I wish to know is, outside the rabble, do the moving picture concerns wish to help national growth or not? Do they realize what the effect is upon coming America—the children—or don't they care? The power of the moving picture is enormous. I have traveled in all the civilized countries of the world and the movement is growing everywhere. It is the twentieth century fairy story and nothing can stop it. Therefore, Mr. Manufacturer and Mr. Operator, I ask you to realize the importance of your mission. Also Mr. Manager, it is up to you to see that the piano player does not play rag time when somebody is dying or an adagio when Elise welcomes Enrique with a pulsating kiss. I have just come from a show where I gazed upon a nameless, flickering film presented with all these ill effects. I intended to write a more personal rebuke, but I dread the editor's blue pencil, and lay down my pen with just one fervent plea that the manufacturers and exhibitors of the motion picture will hasten to realize that it is the most potent thing in our midst to-day. Will they rise to the occasion?

BUFFALO BILL PICTURES COMING.

The Two Bills Company, of New York, which was recently incorporated to produce a series of real Wild West plays in conjunction with the Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill troupe, will soon be heard from. A competent photographer and stage director have been traveling with the company for a month or more and have already secured a number of negatives which are now in the hands of the printer. We are informed that the pictures will be the greatest of their kind ever shown to the moving picture public. Colonel Cody (Buffalo Bill) and Major Lillie (Pawnee Bill) would not at first consent to appear in any of the pictures, but they have become very much interested in the work and both are personally appearing in all of the plays. The scenarios are being written by a gentleman who has been a lifelong companion of Colonel Cody and Major Lillie, and as the stories are based upon the early frontier days in the West in which the above mentioned gentlemen both took such an active part, it will make them not only realistic but of historical value. When you stop to consider that all the talent used in these pictures are men and women who have had actual experience on the plains, we look forward to some great horsemanship, feats of daring and thrilling escapades. Numerous exhibitors and exchanges have already inquired when the company expects making their first release, and we are answering them that we will inform them about the 15th of September.

The laboratory work is being done at the plant of The Powers Company, and independent exhibitors who are accustomed to the excellent photographic quality of Powers Picture Plays can expect the Buffalo Bill series to be equally clear. We are not so informed, but we would not be surprised if these pictures should cost the exchange more than the ordinary. But if so they will be a profitable investment. The fame and popularity of the two great men of the plains will make this series of films a splendid drawing card for the exhibitor. Due announcement will be given in these pages of the date of the first issue.

George H. Smith, manager of the London offices of the Vitagraph Company, is a guest at the home of his brother, A. E. Smith. He is enthusiastic over the success Vitagraph films are making in Great Britain and the Colonies and says that trade conditions in the British Isles are in a more healthy condition than has existed for a long time. George is, like his brothers, A. E. and "Vic.," a hustler. It was he who managed to get a negative of the funeral of King Edward dispatched by special messenger on an ocean greyhound, on the same day as the event occurred, and thus enabled the Vitagraph Company to outdo all competitors in issuing the film in this country.

H. A. Spanuth, late of the Dandy Film Exchange, 10 East Fifteenth street, has hung out the "To Let" sign in front of his house, and has already moved his office force to his new quarters, at 110 Fourth avenue. The William Steiner Exchange, having bought the Dandy Film Exchange, offered Mr. Spanuth the position of general manager, which he readily accepted. The duties of his new office have already begun, and with his experience in the film business, first with the association and now with the independent forces, we think he is in the right position to show his worth, and congratulate the Steiner Exchange upon their new asset.

THE JOHNSON AND JEFFRIES PICTURES

are making good wherever they have been shown. As the agitation of the fanatical newspapers calms down, applications for State rights are coming in and several have been disposed of. The orderly audiences and the good reports of the pictures themselves has turned the tide in their favor. Many bids for territory have been received, but the bidders in most cases have seemingly overlooked the enormous expense of producing these pictures and the J. & J. Company will be lucky if they get back what they have spent. Judging from reports there will be big money for the exhibitor of these pictures for some time to come, but those who secure them will have to come up with the roll or a large share of the gate receipts for the privilege.

WHY NOT A BLACK LIST?

An out-of-town exhibitor sends us a letter warning other exhibitors against a self-styled operator by the name of Clark, hailing from New York. Clark, it seems, accepted a position, traveling expenses and salary, but gave nothing in return. In fact, when the time came to open the show he did not even know how to start the machine. So the exhibitor, unable to get another operator at the last moment, had to refund the box receipts to a large and disappointed audience. It has been suggested that the World publish a "black list," not a desirable thing to do, but which seems to be a necessity for the good of the business. When this "black list" appears, if it ever does, it will not be confined to fraud operators, but will also pillory a few managers and exhibitors who have taken mean advantage of the employee.

"THE HOUSE WITH CLOSED SHUTTERS"—A DRAMATIC POEM.

If anyone doubts the good taste of the common people, that doubt will be removed by watching the effect of the Biograph play, "The House with Closed Shutters," on the audience of a moving picture show.

The composition represents a series of grave and dignified events in a proud Southern family at the outbreak of the Civil War. The movement of the battle scenes does not lead to any happy solution of the family disgrace. All the other episodes are sombre and the catastrophe is unhappy.

The play was a decided success.

Why?

That is the question everyone asks.

Why does one picture play stay flat on the canvas or only excite a few noise-boxes in the gallery while another moves out into the audience, into the hearts of all intelligent spectators and elicits spontaneous approval?

The larger question I have answered on another page in a general article on "The Elusive Quality."

The success of this particular play is largely due to its exquisite pathos and almost as much to the flawless portrayal of the scenes.

The delicate pathos is attached to the situation of a spirited Dixie girl, one of those Southern roses whose fragrance was the Southern soldier's breath of life. Behind every Dixie soldier was a proud-hearted woman willing and ready to die in his place. The girl in the play inspires her two suitors to fight, fight, fight, and never yield. It hardly seems necessary for her to encourage her brother. In his veins flows the spirit of Southern chivalry. Down a long line of military ancestors, who have fought since the time the country was first settled, has come the "iron in the blood." For the sake of the name he bears, he will be furthest out on the firing line. She fortifies him with her sisterly love and trust, and places the family honor in his keeping.

AGNES IS CAUGHT IN THE BATTLE'S MAELSTROM.
Scene from "The House with Closed Shutters" (Biograph).

AGNES SAVES THE CONFEDERATE FLAG.
Scene from "The House with Closed Shutters" (Biograph).

Right there is the note that reaches human sympathy.

The exalted bravery of the Southern woman failed not, even when the cause was lost and she had to bear the greater burden of sorrow.

She is forever enshrined in manly hearts.

When that brother, after being entrusted with important despatches, turns coward, resorts to drink and seeks shelter in the ancestral home, we feel for that loving and trusting sister.

The pity of it all!

We know what the girl will do.

With noble self-forgetfulness, the spirit to bear up against misfortune and an almost superhuman power to dare, to achieve and to suffer, she dons her brother's uniform and rides forth to do his duty. She delivers the despatches and becomes involved in a fierce battle. At times she falters, the scene is a horrible one, women do not love destruction, but she dashes in, the iron is in her blood, she attempts to save the flag and falls mortally wounded facing the enemy.

Her brother's name is listed among the honored dead.

Her brother really lives behind closed doors and shutters. A drunken decadent, he lives on and on through weary years. It is given out that he bravely died and his sister, with disordered mind, overturned by his supposed death, is behind those shutters.

Year after year, the faithful suitors leave their tributes of affection at the door of the old Southern house.

The family honor is preserved, while somewhere in the unmarked trenches are the bones of the Southern rose.

The play is a veritable poem. L. R. H.

CHICAGO NOTES.

The town has gone crazy "Knights Templar." Everything is Templar, and even majestic State street, lined with its beautiful stores, is now christened "Templar Way."

It is Conclave week and outside of the thousands of visitors from every point of the country, it seems that all the inhabitants of the suburban towns have invaded the Windy City. To tell the truth, the beautiful decorations are inducement enough to bring visitors from even distant points.

For the unfortunates (and there are millions of them) who could not take part in this pageant affair, we are pleased to be able to cheer them, in telling them that on August 30 the great parade of Tuesday, August 9, and the numerous drills of the Sir Knights, will be faithfully shown on the screen, even of the smallest village of the United States. This is due to the energetic enterprise of the Selig Polyscope Company. W. N. Selig, who has already made a name for his company, with the Shriners at New Orleans, lost no time in making arrangements with John D. Cleveland, the president of the Triennial Committee, by which he secured the exclusive privilege of taking moving pictures of the different drills executed by the Knights Templar during their exercises of this week.

The Selig Polyscope Company had five cameras in operation under the care of their best men and they obtained some 20,000 feet of negative; evidently only the best parts of these negatives will be used to make up the film to be shown on the screen.

The different moving picture theaters of Chicago, especially the ones located in the Loop, are reaping a harvest this week, no matter what they show, as the streets are jammed and many visitors enter an amusement place, not so much for the show, but to rest from the push of the streets.

At Sixty-third street and Wentworth avenue we find perhaps one of the best motion picture theaters outside of the Loop district. This pretty house is run by J. Miller, who by devoting his personal attention to the welfare of his patrons, reaps the benefit. The theater has 300 seats, so conveniently arranged that a good view of the screen is obtainable from any part of the house. Licensed pictures are in vogue here and seem to well please the audience, which, as noticed, was of a high class. To obtain the patronage of the cultured classes Mr. Miller stops at nothing to improve his service, and as an innovation, he employs the services of a young lady, with a blind accompanist, to render selections between pictures.

The Fairyland Theater, located at Forty-fifth and State streets, although small and unpretentious, is well managed and is tastefully decorated on the inside, the theme being "The Old German Hunting Scene." Walter S. Altland is the manager and appears to exert every effort to please his patrons. The Fairyland is a licensed house with a seating capacity of about two hundred and seventy. The house is about eighty feet deep, with a throw of a little over sixty feet. Jas. E. Madigan, the operator, projects a very clear and steady picture

H. H. Buckwalter, the owner of the very popular licensed film exchange of Denver, Col., is paying a short visit to his old friend, Bill, Selig, and other Chicagoans. His stay will not be long in the Windy City, as he is on an Eastern trip and Mr. Buckwalter wishes to spend most of his vacation time at Atlantic City, N. J.

Prof. Clyde W. Votaw of the University of Chicago divinity school recommends the modernizing of Christianity and a twentieth century interpretation of the Bible.

"The Bible brings to us the religious experiences, visions, standards and customs of ancient peoples. We live in a modern age. Why set up an ancient age as the formative one in teaching religion?

"If we can make it appear that religion means right conduct, we shall have cleared the way for a new interpretation of religion."

CONSERVATION—WILL IT APPLY TO THE MOVING PICTURE BUSINESS?

By Samuel Stern, Philadelphia.

Much is made of conservation these days.

Our forests, mines, fertile plants and water powers must be conserved for the use of generations that follow us. The forests that are cut down cannot be grown again even in a generation to come; the coal mines that are exhausted can never be replenished. The soil that is impoverished by continual crops requires years to regain its fertility. Conservation is the preserving of the natural resources of the nation. This requires co-operation on the part of a large majority of the people. The great national movement is now under way to arouse the nation to a sense of its wastefulness in the past and to sound the warning for the future.

What about conservation of the "moving picture business" among the manufacturers and dealers everywhere?

Is there not a great waste going on in many places, that is not only useless, but positively detrimental to those engaged in the wasting?

Is it possible to conserve in some way the business interests of the moving picture manufacturers and dealers?

To conserve better prices you must not encourage the cutting of prices, and by so doing you will not have to undermine your competitor, and by not encouraging the cheaper prices, you will be able to get better material, you will be the means of helping better labor conditions, better mechanics, better understanding between manufacturers and film exchanges and the great trade they supply. Which will conserve the better? Every moving picture supply manufacturer fighting it out alone, or uniting his energy and influence with the larger and older manufacturers of supplies, machines and film concerns, in a national movement to secure these things?

Is the experience of a man identified with the business since its infancy worth anything to you? Is it worth you patronizing the man who would sell you his wares and sell them at the same time to your customer and by so doing take from you the biggest portion of your profit?

Think and reflect.

Wm. Anderson, proprietor of the Silk City Amusement Company, who own the Royal Theater, 269 Main street, Paterson, N. J., placed order last Monday with J. H. Hallberg, 36 East Twenty-third street, New York City, for a 220-volt D. C. Economizer, which will save 70 per cent. on his bill, and at the same time improve his light wonderfully. Mr. Anderson is one of the most up-to-date young men in the moving picture business, and has some of the most modern theaters in this vicinity under his control.

THERE'S A REASON

Unfortunately this department and the publication of which it forms a part is peculiarly at a disadvantage in dealing with items of news that, in a general sense partake of a color that is foreign to our publication. In view of the circumstances that attend the situation, and this narrative, it may be assumed that I can refer with propriety to the attempted assassinaion of Mayor Gaynor, of New York City. If the same conditions existed with regard to the relations between the regular theatrical—dramatic—circles, every dramatic publication in the country would devote ample space to the subejct. Mayor Gaynor (and I believe most sincerely without thought or design) having been peculiarly in touch and sentiment with the motion picture world, deserves at least a little attention from its representatives.

The attempt upon Mayor Gaynor's life was an inexcusable, dastardly act, and his speedy recovery from the wound is heartily wished for.

In letters of the past I have referred to the invaluable aid the moving picture men received at the hands of the then Judge and now Mayor Gaynor, through his independence, impartiality and eagerness, and determination to enforce fair play. His balance of mind was never better demonstrated than when a present ex-Mayor of New York City, on Christmas Eve, 1908, arbitrarily shut down about eight hundred moving picture shows. Judge Gaynor granted temporary injunctions that afforded instant relief. His opinion was that the moving picture men were entitled to a fair and impartial hearing and there was no apparent desire to vacate the injunctions, except in cases where violations could be shown. When Judge Gaynor ran for Mayor of Greater New York the people identified with the moving picture interests threw no stumbling blocks in his way.

A certain yellow publication having its outgrowth in Greater New York, most venomously opposed the election of Mr. Gaynor as Mayor. That same yellow publication, figuring, or assuming to figure as the protector of morality and decency in New York, has most consistently fought and persecuted the moving picture interests.

It is a peculiar coincidence that in the first extra issued by the New York Journal immediately after the attempted assassination of Mayor Gaynor there appeared in practically the same article an announcement of the event and also a report that a young woman in Brooklyn "distressed by the vivid portrayal of a love scene she had witnessed at a moving picture show, had committed suicide." The article referring to Mayor Gaynor occupied special space on the front page, printed in red ink, and immediately below it, also printed in red ink was the article referring to the moving picture suicide. I refer to this as a coincidence. Such it may have been, at the same time I reserve my conclusions. It is not many weeks since Mayor Gaynor, despite the frantic yellow journal pleas and importunities, refused to stop the exhibition of certain motion pictures for the reason that his own judgment and the opinion of the Corporation Counsel sustained the contention that there was no law covering the case. An appeal was made to Governor Hughes, who very wisely remarked that "The Judge (the Mayor) ought to know the law."

But aside of coincidences, let us deal with facts. Why tolerate this continual pounding of the motion pictures inspired by poisoned minds. This cry, that certain portrayals in the moving pictures pervert young minds and unbalance weak intellects, is a gross falsity. The declarations are made either with michievous design or through sheer criminal intent. Time and again the people interested in the moving picture business have declared their willingness to abide by anything within reason that would tend towards paving their way towards furnishing, without molestation, an entertaining and instructive amusement for the public and do all in their power to remove any objectionable features in the making or creation of the pictures. Time and again has the justified plea been made that before presentation the pictures were submitted to, and passed upon by, a trustworthy board of censorship.

Many have expressed their doubts about the censorship declarations and the following from the New York World is most timely: "Twice a week the Committee on Censoring of the National Board of Censorship meets at the rooms of a Fifth avenue manufacturing concern to pass upon the films that are to be put out by the licensed manufacturers of picture films. Every film that is to be sold anywhere in the United States is shown to them, and if they meet with disapproval they are destroyed. The Censoring Committee consists of fifteen persons and is under the general supervision of an advisory committee, including many persons of national standing, such as Dr. Lyman Abbott, Felix Adler, the Rev. Charles F. Aked, Andrew Carnegie, Jacob A. Riis, Albert Shaw and Anson Phelps Stokes."

Can any of the newspapers show that their reports or editorials pass through better hands?

People are gradually realizing that the step between the newspaper and the motion picture is a short one. They are both engaged in the same line of business—bringing before the public eye the events of the day, the incidents of history and the creations of the better minds. The motion pictures have long since excited the envy and ill-will of the dramatic and vaudeville people. It will not be long before the newspaper people will feel its influence. Motion pictures will ultimately supplant two and three inch headliners with more effect and truth than attaches to the present-day schemes. Bogus extra editions will become a thing of the past. Subsidized editors and reporters will be seeking jobs. The truth will prevail, the liberty of the press will be rightfully sustained and blackmailing will not be rampant under the cloak of influence.

The time is drawing near when the motion picture people who have millions of dollars at stake in a legitimate enterprise will be obliged to turn upon the foot that is so maliciously trying to crush them. It will soon be time to determine whether, under existing laws, it is the power or the liberty of the press the people have to deal with. When it is properly exercised no American citizen will attempt to interfere with or curtail the liberty of the press. Its power has become quite another question.

One thing must not be forgotten. Discriminating laws cannot be sustained. There is no possible reason why moving picture plays should be subjected to all kinds of censorships, rules and regulations and all regular stage productions allowed to pass unquestioned. So it is with the newspaper. Like the motion picture it is a source of enlightenment, information and instruction, and should be as closely censured, if not more, because it not only gets into the places of amusement, but also attains wide circulation on the streets, in all public places and is carried to the very heart of the households with all its vivid, highly colored, demoralizing tales of the events of the day, and disgusting, nauseating accounts of events of the past.

On a showing of hands by the average daily newspaper and motion pictures, I am convinced the former would run a very poor second before a competent Board of Censorship. For truthfulness it would certainly be outclassed.

Perhaps, when it can be shown that the press is subservient to the opinion and will of the people, the motion pictures will be allowed to follow their legitimate course without unjust molestation.

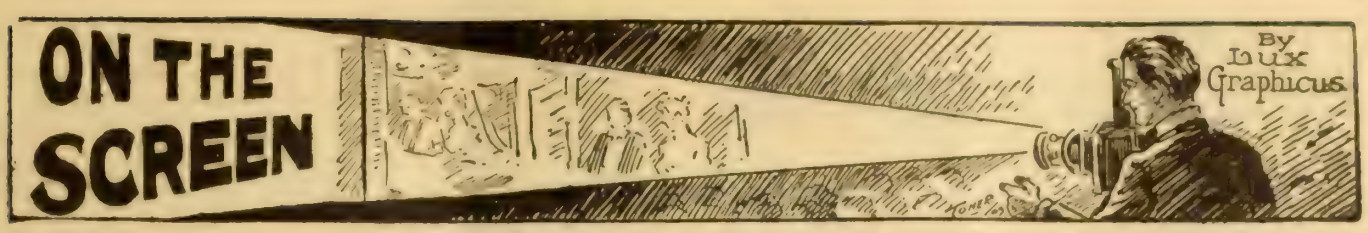
I searched the later editions of the New York Journal and could find no reference to the girl suicide referred to in the red ink paragraph immediately following the one referring to the shooting of Mayor Gaynor. Perhaps the paper discovered motion pictures had nothing to do with the suicide. Possibly the item was too ridiculous for repeated publication.



I paid my first visit to an airdome last week. I mean an urban airdome. And by urban airdome, I mean an airdome right here in New York City, that is, on Manhattan Island. It was not the first time that I had seen a moving picture at night, in the open air, but it was the first time that I had actually spent an evening with malice aforethought in an officially styled airdome.

By the way, what a funny word this word airdome is! It really has no obvious connection with the picture, or rather it does not clearly express a relationship to it. Take the word hippodrome. This clearly means a place where horse sports or exercises are indulged in. Velodrome, too, might be held to mean a place where sports take place such as those in which the wheel, be it cycling or other vehicular progression takes part. But "airdome" has hardly any relation to the picture that I can see. Picturedome might pass. Anyhow, as it is plain that we are on the hunt for words to describe the moving picture house, perhaps somebody will offer a prize for a more expressive word than "airdome" for the open air moving picture entertainment.

Never mind the particular location. I had long studied the construction, progress and career of my airdome. It is near a moving picture theater operated under the same management, so that when the weather is bad or stormy, the airdome is closed and the theater opened; when the weather is fine the theater is closed and the airdome is opened. A very sensible business arrangement, which I mention for the benefit of the moving picture industry generally.

America has not yet got down to the al fresco life of the European continent. This is probably because Americans, as the distinguished English actor, A. E. Mathews, points out this week, take their pleasure quickly and in tabloid doses. But the airdome is symptomatic of some sort of desire on the part of the people to sit down at night and enjoy an entertainment in the open air, such as they do in most parts of Europe.

In Paris, for example, people eat and live out of doors on the tree shaded boulevards. In Paris also there is the open air cafe chantant. In Belgium, Germany and Austria we have also the same delightful system of living, drinking, eating in the open air with entertainments. This is what I mean by "al fresco" entertainment.

One of the most prominent men in the American film business to-day is of French birth. Asking him some time ago how he liked New York City, he shrugged his shoulders in true French style, and said that he liked it very much, but felt the loss of the boulevard—that is, the pleasure of eating and drinking out of doors under the trees and at night time of watching an entertainment. Still, to a traveled man like myself, there are distinct touches of continentalism in New York City and its environments. There is Hoboken, across the river, which is very German in its al fresco tendencies, and I am constantly being surprised right here in the heart of Manhattan by the efforts of the various nationalities which make up the population of New York City to take every possible advantage of living out of doors which the city affords.

I am going to write some more on this subect of the airdome and my experiences. Meanwhile, I want to record my first impressions on the subject. My airdome is situated not five miles from this office in a northerly direction. The ground on which it stands will probably be built on within a year or two. By day it presents not a particularly inviting appearance. There are the outer billboards with the necessary inscription on them, boosting up the empty airdome. The pay box, of course, is empty. You peer in through the gates, you seen in the farther distance a screen already in position, a place for the orchestra and then rows of seats, accommodating many hundreds.

But at night, when I paid my first visit recently, what a pleasant change! Well dressed people were hustling each other at the pay box, uniformed ushers were there directing them to their seats. There was a blaze of illumination inside. The grounds, if I may so call the arena, were softly illuminated by rows of colored lamps. The arena was full of interested, well dressed, high class people and the picture on the 20-foot screen moved to the excellent and rhythmic playing of a well chosen orchestra. I sat down and leisurely smoked my cigarette; the stars peeped out from the indigo vault of the sky; there was a touch, there was a buzz, there was a hum of animation around me, and altogether I was seized by the spirit of my environment which was distinctly pleasant, soothing and stimulating. In short I saw the picture in almost ideal conditions, especially as I was in company with some charming members of the other sex, who were making their first acquaintance with the American airdome.

Optically and otherwise, perhaps, we have not reached the ideal conditions for showing the picture out of doors. There is probably room for some mechanical method of intensifying the apparent brightness of the picture on the screen. This matter of out-of-door projection at night is of great interest to me. I wonder how many of my readers are aware of the circumstance that you can project a picture on the clouds? The clouds may be three or four hundred feet above you. I once saw a magic lantern picture actually projected in this way. If you can only make the clouds stand still and near enough to you, there is no reason why you should not project moving pictures on them. Don't "larf," reader. I am pretty well up in dates and can quote you chapter and verse for the projection of pictures on the clouds. Try me!

There are enormous possibilities before the airdome as a development of the pastoral play idea. It is a branch of the business which may be truly said to be just beginning to make itself felt. In a year or two, I have no doubt that we shall be looking back to these crudely built and improvised airdomes of New York City with same amusement. Your airdome may become a veritable garden, with trees, lawns, private boxes, and supping places to which society may resort. For society, you know, loves outdoor life and the opportunity of showing off its best diamonds and frocks. Nothing delights the average woman so much as moonlight, trees, music and some sort of entertainment to fill in times. There weren't many diamonds at my airdome the other night, and no evening dresses. But there were many well dressed, hatless women with wraps: as I said, a good class of audience. These, like myself, thoroughly enjoyed the show. I shall be giving some more of my airdome experiences and impressions. Of course, al fresco entertainment life in a city like New York, where land is becoming so increasingly valuable, is very difficult to maintain. The plan of the city forbids it. Paris, Belgium, Vienna and other large cities, however, are not so much built on as is New York. At one time London possessed many splendid gardens or parks where al fresco entertainments were given. If those places exist now, the moving picture would be seen there. Alas! The builder has swept them all away. The builder has no respect for places or persons. As the French say in their proverb: "Nothing is sacred to a sapper."

The Art of Acting Before the Camera.

Why do so many actors and actresses show by their acting that they are before the camera instead of the living audience, and resort to as much "dumb show" and motion language? Surely they should understand that the reproduction of their actions are before the living audience. By remembering this the superfluous would be eliminated and the more natural take its place. There is no need to introduce motions as if explaining the cause of their next move. If the plot is intelligent it can be understood, and, if so be that it cannot be readily grasped, let it create a demand for the use of a little verbal explanation rather than spoil a good piece and good acting by dumb motion. Keep in mind the camera is only a "go between," acting is always before the people.

A READER.

"With Bridges Burned" (Edison).—A novel subject, or perhaps it is better to say, a novel commercial subject. It is the story, graphically told, of a young American business man, who, in the face of almost insurmountable difficulties, secures a large English contract. It is a romantic subject in that it affects his future success and the happiness of his brave little wife, whose tact and encouragement were important factors in the result. Acted with appreciation and filled with the life which the Edison company knows so well how to put into such dramas, the picture should prove popular. It discloses in some degree the methods frequently used in securing contracts. Few understand how this is done and its adequate illustration in a motion picture should be all the more interesting for that reason.

"An Ancient Mariner" (Gaumont).—A comedy representing a retired admiral who follows the same routine on land that he followed while at sea. Its most interesting feature is its adsurdity. The routine on shipboard seems all right, and no one questions it, but transfer it to land and it immediately becomes absurd, even foolish. There is a good deal of humor in something of this sort shown out of its proper environment.

"The Ace of Hearts" (Gaumont).—A story of a dispute over a card game which is finally patched up without a duel. A love story is connected, but without the usual feature of an objecting parent to give it zest. The lovers seem to be doing nicely. It is the father of the girl who gets in bad this time, a novelty, perhaps, worth considering. And the young man helps him out.

"An Unfair Game" (Vitagraph).—In some particulars this picture possesses unusual strength. Briefly, it tells the story of how a cruel young society girl played with the heart of an unsophisticated back-woodsman, who never suspected her purposes. It gives opportunity for some clever emotional acting, and the excellent work of the actors having those parts deserves commendation. The development of the plot is natural, and the girl's machinations, by which she gradually entangles the young man, are well wrought out. The theme is comparatively new. Generally these pictures represent how a city man works to secure the affections of some country girl; but this is different and for that reason deserves consideration.

"United States Submarine 'Salmon'" (Edison).—A picture of a submarine craft which affords an excellent idea of one of the boats and how it operates. A picture of this kind gives those living in the interior of the country an idea of what a submarine boat is like. Descriptions are notoriously inadequate, but there is much accurate information in a motion picture as this film clearly demonstrates. It often conveys information which could be obtained in no other way. And the firm which sends out a picture of this type is performing a public service well worth while.

"No Man's Land" (Pathe).—A drama with a somewhat novel subject, and worked out with close attention to details and with a full knowledge of the requirements of such pictures. While the drama is not sensationally strong it is good, and will provide entertainment while it runs.

"No Rest for the Weary" (Pathe).—A comedy which seems to prove almost conclusively that those who are unfortunate enough to want rest, apart from whether it is needed or not, are doomed to disappointment and constant disturbance. The film contains much of interest in the way of humorous suggestions.

"The Legend of Scar Face" (Kalem).—An illustration of an Indian legend, with the details worked out in accordance with Indian mythological teachings. Through the power of the Great Spirit, Scar Face is transformed and aided so that he eventually reaches the goal and wins his bride. The chief interest will center in the working out of the legend and the means taken for showing the transformation. Kalem's Indian pictures are deservedly popular, and it is safe to say they have done more than almost any other recent agency to make actual life among the American Indians known and understood.

"Her Father's Pride" (Biograph).—An exhibition of the results of pride which will, perhaps, arouse memories of more or less strength in the minds of a large number of people. A stubborn father, through unreasoning pride, brings much sorrow and many a heartache to his family. When he and his devoted wife are finally driven from their home to the poorhouse he becomes an object of contempt, a common ending of the proud. Then the disowned daughter comes to their rescue and succeeds in subduing her father's pride and thereby re-unites the family. The story is suggestive and causes those who see the film to apply the rule to their own experience, or, perhaps, the experience of some one they have known. Dramatically, the picture is worked out with attention to details, and, photographically, it is up to the Biograph standard.

"The Wooing O't" (Vitagraph).—A fascinating light comedy, telling graphically the story of how a pair of old lovers learned the art of courting by watching some younger people in their love making. As may be supposed numerous funny situations develop, and one scene after another shows complications of various sorts, all of which are humorous.

"Ah Sing and the Greasers" (Lubin).—A Western story, with much of the true flavor of the plains worked out in the form of a comedy. Ah Sing thinks the cowboys are concocting some new joke on some one and captures two daring desperadoes, much to his own surprise and that of everybody else. The situations developed are funny and the acting is more than usually good. In some ways the picture is full of the subtle charm of the elusive spirit of the West and the vigorous life it formerly sustained.

"Mrs. Bargainday's Baby" (Melies).—A funny mix up over a baby. Quite the best features of the picture are the foolish looks of the young men who receive the baby in turn, and contrive in some way to pass it along. Then come the frantic endeavors of the mother to find the missing youngster, and as one after another joins in the chase it becomes a vigorous rout. But ultimately the innocent cause of the disturbance is found safe and sound, and the young man in whose custody it has been placed quite against his will, gives it up with no suspicion of regret in his action.

"The Law of the West" (Selig).—A Western drama of more than ordinary power and worth, developing situations which exhibit the life of that section to good advantage. The picture interprets certain phases of that life in a more graphic way than many that have been presented, and it is an improvement upon those which Selig has himself produced in some particulars. The subtleties of the Western life, those indescribable touches which make it convincing and actually illustrate its spirit are here, and the audience feels their presence without, perhaps, really understanding what it means. The vigor and movement of the entire picture help materially in holding the attention. It is a notable addition to the long series of pictures interpretative of Western life and character.

"Under Western Skies" (Essanay).—"The Great Divide" attracted a great deal of attention as a drama, and acrimonious discussions were frequent concerning it. Here is a picture much like the drama in its beginnings. The girl gives herself to one of the men to escape a worse fate, though she separates from another lover to do it. Later she discovers in a dramatic way that her lover was a poltroon and turns to her husband for protection. The film is better than the drama. The impression conveyed when the girl turns to her husband is inspiring and the picture works out to the end in a satisfactory way. It seems right that she should turn to her husband and the picture is made convincing when that is done. The accessories like the desert and the environments of Western life are all graphically portrayed and help make the story seem more plausible or real. Unquestionably, this firm has produced one of the best pictures which has been put out in a long time. It is one that will appeal to critical audiences and will be of material assistance in enhancing the reputation of motion pictures.

"The Lord's Prayer" (Gaumont).—One sees the announcement of a picture of this character with a good deal of trepidation. Biblical subjects, particularly this one, require extremely careful and reverent work, else they will seem incongruous and altogether unsympathetic. The scenes which make up this series are all interpretative and illustrative of the text of the prayer, and the effect upon the one who sees the film is that of reverence. Further, one seems to acquire a deeper appreciation of the meaning of the inspired words, and there enters into the sentiment aroused a feeling which, perhaps, has never been present before. It is difficult to describe this subtle influence, yet it is so strong that it is lasting. One does not escape from it for days. The costuming and accessories are the work of a master. Not only is he an artist, but he understands interpreting the sentiment expressed in pictures as vital as they can be made. It is the great film of the week—perhaps the greatest for a number of weeks. It will add strength to any program.

"Teneriffe, the Gem of the Canaries" (Gaumont).—An adequate illustration of the beauties of an island noted for its scenic attractions. These outdoor pictures of Gaumont's are always interesting. The operator seems to know the best point of view and the mechanical department does satisfactory work in producing a positive. The film will give one a good idea of the island, its life and its people. It will save a trip there.

"The Latest Fashion 'in Skirts'" (Pathe).—A comedy based upon the difficulties which pursue a fashionable woman who undertakes to parade in the latest fashion of skirt, popularly known as the hobble, and that is about all the wearer can do. Well, it is better to see the picture and judge for yourselves what may happen to you if you wear such a skirt.

"Fiftieth Anniversary in Yokohama" (Pathe).—A good reproduction of scenes in Yokohama during the celebration of an anniversary. It is done in the same excellent way that all of Pathe's work of this kind is done, and the interesting features are made prominent. The film correctly interprets life in that Japanese city, and is well worth seeing.

"Her Mother's Wedding Gown" (Vitagraph).—A story of dramatic power, with numerous features that are interesting beyond the ordinary. For example, a collie dog introduced in the picture does some remarkably good acting. And at the last the picture closes with the old father made happy, even though tribulation followed him for a time. It is acted with all the ability and sympathy which characterizes the work of the Vitagraph players.

"The House with Closed Shutters" (Biograph).—A thrilling commentary upon the difference between cowardice and bravery. A girl dons her brother's uniform, when he is panic stricken with fear and she dies in his place attempting to rescue the Confederate flag. Then the denouement. The shutters on the house are closed and the cowardly brother is doomed to life-long imprisonment in the lonely house, that no one may know of his cowardice. A dramatic recital of circumstances which seem to make a direct personal appeal. It is natural to loathe a coward. It is quite as natural to love bravery, and it formed an ideal theme for a drama to have these two so forcibly contrasted. It is a picture that stirs the emotions. No picture that we have seen for many days in Keith's, our favorite stamping ground, so roused the enthusiasm of a large audience. The realism of the battle scenes, the intense mental strain of the mother, contrasted with the actions of the cowardly and profligate son, the heroism of the young girl and the constancy of her lover, all combined and elucidated by careful acting, made this the feature film of the week.

"The Heart of a Sioux" (Lubin).—It has remained for the motion picture to show that Indians have hearts. They have been looked upon as stolid, unemotional people, but the motion picture, quick to seize upon any indication of emotion has developed a series of illustrations which have almost convinced very many that the Indian loves as well as hates, an important feature of life. Lubin presents a dramatic episode in the life of an Indian girl who loved her teacher, and was able to retain her composure, even though her heart was broken, until she reached her father, and there she sobbed out her sorrow as many another unfortunate woman has done before. Dramatic incidents are introduced which represent the maiden as saving her teacher's life twice. These add zest to the film, but exert little influence on the main theme, the love of the Indian girl for her teacher. The picture will go far to remove the stigma which this oft-repeated assertion, that Indians lack heart, has placed upon the race. This accurate rendering of character, with its dramatic accompaniments, will or should be an assistant in helping to correct false impressions.

"The Troubles of a Flirt" (Pathe).—This film tells in rather graphic manner the difficulties and troubles into which a flirt may be plunged. The situations afford considerable opportunity for clever acting and the players entrusted with the interpretation of the drama have rendered their various parts with fidelity. The film is lively and humorous and leaves the audience good natured when considering the complications which surround the flirt.

"Jewish Types in Russia" (Pathe).—In this film the motion picture performs one of its most important functions. It conveys valuable information. That, perhaps, is sufficient reason for its existence; but apart from that it attracts because it presents types of persons and exhibits life but little known. Much is heard about the Jews in Russia. They are known principally through their misfortunes, due to the oppression of the Russian people. Here they are graphically presented, affording an opportunity to see them as they are and see them at home. Whatever may be the merits or demerits of the controversy marked by so much blood, this picture will help admirably in making the people themselves understood. For that reason it deserves wide circulation and close attention.

"The Picturesque Waters of Italy" (Gaumont).—A beautiful outdoor picture, presenting some of Italy's most picturesque water scenery. Commendation is due the operator for his excellent work. His view points were selected with extraordinary appreciation of artistic possibilities, and his efforts were followed by the mechanical manipulators, who carried on the excellent work he began and made a film which would be hard to equal. It is always a pleasure to look at a Gaumont outdoor picture. It is usually photographed with care and all the other operations are similarly carried out. The result is a film which is an artistic triumph, conveying accurate impressions of the scene reproduced. Here the opportunities were extraordinary, and they were utilized to the best advantage.

"Mulcahy's Raid" (Essanay).—An amusing illustration of the old story of the Irishman who surrounded a number of men and took them into camp. He doesn't quite do it alone in this instance, but when he arrives at the station-house he is alone, and he informs the desk man that his own personal prowess is responsible for the important capture. There are scenes of interest, including a motion picture company at work, a cock fight, and others that will attract attention. The play is acted with all the vim of the Essanay players and deserves to be popular. It is humorous by the incongruity of its situation, as well as by the acting of the capable company.

"A College Chicken" (Essanay).—A chicken joke that is funny, not alone in the peculiar situations developed, but the actors succeed in extracting more fun than might be supposed possible from a subject of this character. The boys deprived the unfortunate colored man of his legitimate prey, a chicken. He was not present to enjoy their chagrin when they, too, were deprived of the chicken, after it was cooked ready for eating. Meanwhile the enjoyment of the girls who discover the cooked chicken outside their window is contagious and everyone is infected but the boys who lose. It is an excellent humorous film and carries a hearty laugh for everybody who sees it.

"A Colonial Belle" (Kalem).—A Revolutionary war picture based upon an incident of the stirring days of 1776. The story is dramatically told and holds the interest without flagging, from beginning to end. Aside from that the picture gives evidence of care in its pictorial features, of an attempt to make the costumes and scenery conform to the subject. Too little attention has been devoted to this phase of motion picture making, as has often been pointed out in these criticisms. But here is a serious attempt to provide a correct background and accurate costuming. An evidence of the care exercised in its production is represented by the fact that the colonial mansion which appears in some of the scenes, notably the one where Col. Roger departs for the war, was discovered in an old Connecticut town and looks as though it might have been standing during the scenes which this picture represents. More of this care must be exercised if manufacturers hope to secure and hold the attention of the best people in their audiences. The Kalem people have successfully shown the way. It should not be difficult to follow it in the future. It is not the first time the Kalem people have exercised such care. Many of their popular Southern pictures have been examples of accurate backgrounds and correct costuming. They have extended the same care to a more ambitious subject and the result of their effort is a notable film. Continued popularity is predicted for it. The gowns, for example, are all original, and are in the possession of the owners of the mansion about which the picture centers. Such absolute accuracy would not be always possible, but when it is, it has its effect.

"The Water Cure" (Gaumont).—A live comedy, representing how a man adopted the water cure as a panacea for his ailments. It may be understood, perhaps, that not in all instances was his treatment voluntary, and that adds to the humor of the situation. It is, however, a comedy that will make your patrons laugh, and in that respect is well worth consideration. It is, perhaps, as lively as any of the recent Gaumont comedies.

"Forgiven" (Selig).—A drama which will please those who appreciate a good plot, with sympathetic acting, and features of human interest which develop as the story proceeds. Like all the Selig plays of this type, the actors succeed in putting much of life and animation into it. The heart interest is well maintained, and there is much emotion in the development of the plot and the working out of the story.

INDEPENDENT.

"The Rest Cure" (Atlas).—Perhaps some who go on vacations to the quiet of the country will appreciate the grim humor in this film. More than one has been immured among conditions so foreign to what was represented and expected, and so out of harmony with his desires, that he has speedily left for his home, convinced that the simple life, with its inconveniences and opportunities for unpleasant and unexpected incidents is not all it might or should be. The vacationist who sees this film will readily recognize many reproductions of his own experiences and, like John, will resolve never to commit the same crime again.

"Sons of the West" (Nestor).—A lively Western story, in which a wild race for the minister, and a hasty wedding form a conspicuous portion. There is a robbery, fastened on the wrong man, an objecting father, and other interesting, not to say exciting, features. But crooked paths are all made straight, and the bride and groom are forgiven by the erstwhile irate parent, and life goes merrily on in the plainsman's humble home.

"The Eagle and the Eaglet" (Film d'Art).—A picture representing some of the happiest hours in Napoleon's life. The story is interesting enough, but the historically correct costumes and accessories add materially to the attraction of the picture. Indeed, in accuracy of design and sumptuousness of execution it would be difficult to conceive anything more beautiful. It is a bit out of the life of a historic character which will linger long in one's memory. Moreover, it will supply a means for learning about the mode of life of the persons who lived at that time.

"Yankeeanna" (Imp).—Here is a suggestion for those diplomats who seek to avoid war between different countries. Preparations for a serious conflict are in progress, but a trio of international weddings puts an end to this and induces the two countries to conclude an honorable peace. If international weddings could be utilized as a discourager of war there might be some compensation for the continued sale of American girls to broken-down foreign gentlemen, whose only claim to consideration is their title. And then comes a motion picture film, and whether consciously or not, it solves the problem of war and suggests some practical use for the international wedding.

"The Buried Man of Tebessa" (Eclair).—An impressive subject. The old savage method of burying a man up to his neck alive is shown. Though the unfortunate is rescued, it is too late, and he falls dead in his sweetheart's arms. But even that is not enough. So the author sends the grieving girl to join her dead lover.

"Competition of the Police and Guard Dogs" (Eclair).—A reproduction of wonderful canine intelligence, affording a marvelous manifestation of what dogs can do when properly trained. Pictures which reproduce animal intelligence are always interesting, and this is no exception to that rule.

"Once Upon a Time" (Imp).—A lively story with a sort of Don Quixote impression. She was a romantic maiden. He was an unimaginative farm hand and had little use for her vaporings, gathered from the pages of plumed knight novels. But when a traveling hypnotist makes her see him as a plumed knight, and she falls into his arms, he is quick enough to take all that comes to him. The picture moves along with a good deal of vim and dash and develops a good deal of interest as it goes, without being more than ordinarily strong.

"Her Private Secretary" (Powers).—Here is a dramatic complication that will keep your audience interested until the close. A young authoress engages as private secretary a young man who has been a convict. A love episode follows. It couldn't be otherwise when two such people come together, and the working out of the story holds the attention, without one dull moment. Sympathetically acted and well photographed, the film is certain to be popular. There is a sense of actual life about it which is too subtle for explanation, but it can be felt, and adds materially to the strength of the picture.

"Jenk's Day Off" (Thanhouser).—A humorous story of a gentleman, who, bored at the Summer hotel where his family is stopping, decides to take a day off. He gets into many amusing scrapes, landing in the hands of the police on the charge of robbing a house ultimately. Then comes the difficulty of squaring things with his wife and daughter. It all might happen, anyhow, and that, perhaps, makes it all the funnier.

"A Miner's Sweetheart" (Bison).—A love story of the mines, representing a girl coming into the life of a rough miner. Temporary separation follows through the girl's brother, but later the miner does the brother a service and the couple are reunited. It has a strong plot, but the theme, the separation of two lovers and their subsequent reunion, can scarcely be called novel. It is satisfactorily worked out in this instance and the interest is retained, but it seems in places almost like a repetition of some previous story of the same character.

"A Cowboy's Generosity" (Bison).—The matter of selling a girl to pay a mortgage is brought to the attention here. The scene of the picture is laid in a romantic section of California. But beautiful scenery does not atone for the representation of barter of this character. Like the former riot of murder and bloodshed, and later the kidnapping of girls, it seems as though this well-worn incident had performed its part. In this instance the unfortunate girl is twice bartered, though the second time she is supposed to love the man who liquidates the mortgage that causes all the trouble. Selling girls in this way is too suggestive of a certain type of slavery and the writer is strongly of the opinion that such scenes should be left off the films.

"The Restoration" (Thanhouser).—A drama based upon loss of memory through an injury. A little girl is left alone to mourn her father's loss, while he has married another woman and lives comfortably in a neighboring city. But she escapes from the asylum and wanders to the city, and the sight of her restores her father's memory, and then comes happiness for all. It is an emotional story, and might be true.

"Magdalene" (Great Northern).—A melodrama illustrating very graphically the temptations and episodes in the life of a girl, and her dramatic conversion by a religious reformer. The story is told with power and there is an appeal to the emotions which thrills at times. Again there is a pathos, and through it all runs a note of warning which might well be heeded by every girl similarly situated. The best thing on the independent screen for some time.

"His Baby's Shirt" (Powers).—An interesting story of how a man was prevented from becoming a burglar in a very unique way. The surprise will add to the interest of the film, and the acting of a baby but a year old is a feature well worth attention.

"The Hermit of the Rockies" (Champion).—A love story centering around a hermit's shack in the mountains. There is a band of outlaws, driven away by a dashing young tenderfoot who knows his business, a broken leg and a girl hurrying to help relieve the sufferer, and then a delicious love story worked out among these picturesque surroundings. The story's strength is largely due to environment. Without them it would be somewhat dreary. With them it possesses a charm otherwise unknown. It is a narrative which is old, yet ever new, and cannot fail to please any audience.

"A True Country Heart" (Bison).—The country girl, deceived by the city man, elopes and leaves her parents and country lover. This story works out in quite the logical way, with the accompaniments of a stern father, and the city man becoming neglectful and going to the bad. But the country young man's heart remains true, and while the picture does not tell it all, it leaves the assumption that there will be a happier future for the deceived girl. The story is not new. It is hardly worked out in a new way, but these stories continue to appeal because of the romance and the heart interest which accompanies their telling. They may be hackneyed, but they seem to hold the attention of the audience unchanged, regardless of the number of times they are told and retold.

"A Man's Way" (Powers).—Sometimes the man who leaves a trusting girl for another receives full measure pressed down and running over. The hero of this tale waits until the wealthy girl he expected to marry elopes with someone else, then returns to his old love. But she, too, is married and the young fellow gets a severe shock when she presents to him her baby boy. It was no more than he deserved, will be the verdict of most who see the picture. Yet, it must be confessed that the producer has reproduced actual life with an understanding that is unusual.

"The Mad Hermit" (Thanhouser).—A picture which touches the heart and arouses the strongest emotions. It can be readily understood how a man might become a maniac under such circumstances. The loss of wife and daughter is sufficient to overthrow reason. That a man should be a hermit afterward seems not unusual. Then comes the excitement of the runaway, the rescue of the baby and the discovery of his daughter, with returning reason and love to follow during his declining years. The emotions will be strongly aroused by this picture, and that will make it popular. Whatever touches the heart is always popular, and this seems to appeal with unusual power.

NOTES FROM WASHINGTON, D. C.

A recent reel that caused quite a sensation in Washington from the independent people was Uncle Tom's Cabin (Thanhouser), which caused quite a stampede in front of the Empress Theater. This play is arranged in a continuous performance, taking about thirty minutes for its presentation. The music which accompanied it consisted of plantation melodies and songs, which added much to the effectiveness of the play, and should be a hint to other exhibitors to bring out the true spirit of the silent drama with appropriate music.

Manager Notes was asked by his patrons to retain the film for another day to satisfy the large demand for seats, but he declined, saying it was the policy of his house to change the bill daily, presenting only first-time-shown films, a most absurd stand for any exhibitor to take. Give the public what it wants, even if it is six months old subjects. Mr. Dexter's firm is known as the Craft Film Service. He is also an artist of the poster variety. His posters are seen before almost every motion picture theater in Washington, proclaiming in attractive colors, unique designs, and appropriate figures the features of the independent film producers.

The independent film people have a hustling agent for Washington and vicinity in the person of J. Boyd Dexter, located in the Empress Theater Building. The service is good and the subjects are of the kind that interest the public. Speaking of his experiences Mr. Dexter said, "When I first came here about a year ago, I had a hard struggle—like every new concern. The first man to give me encouragement was Manager Mayer of The Casino. Then other theaters were willing to venture with me and now I have a very active business, not only in this city, but in the states of Maryland and Virginia. I can tell you, it makes a man hustle to keep up with the demands, especially with new theaters constantly entering the field. The independent films have made rapid inroads in the world of motion pictures in this vicinity in the past year."

The three reels of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" by the Vitagraph Company are creating much interest by their runs at the various houses in the Capital City. I dropped in to witness Part I at The Hippodrome and found the scenes closely following the play which is so well known to the public. The accompanying music was appropriately arranged, consisting of plantation melodies. Manager La Motte of The Hippodrome is one of the active members of the motion picture business of Washington. He intersperses his reels with old folk songs and modern ballads without slides and he finds them most pleasing to his patrons. Parts II and III of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" are being eagerly sought, after Part I has been seen. They are still making their rounds in the city, so that everyone will have a chance to witness this excellent presentation of a side light on slavery. The cast of the Vitagraph Company is very good, even the parts taken by the little piccaninnies being very natural. Washington recognized one of her own talented young ladies in the person of "Eliza," who, as Miss Clair Fuller, played important roles in semi-professional dramatic performances in this city. Her acting was always noted for its naturalness and careful portrayal, characteristics which are so essential in the silent drama.

The Capital City has certainly developed an abnormal appetite for motion pictures, a fact which was well demonstrated on Sunday night at the Columbia Theater when Lyman H. Howe was presenting one of his interesting travelogues. With a capacity of 1,500, "Standing room only" was reached long before the time for beginning the performance. Yet all the other moving picture houses in various parts of the city were doing excellent business. One of the chief attractions of the Howe exhibition was the Funeral Procession of King Edward VII, a reel that was most life-like and impressive. The water pictures of the sea, falls, cascades, fiords, lakes, and rivers were so natural that the audiences instinctively forgot the heat of the evening and felt as cool as the scenes before them.

The National Motion Picture Magazine continues to be very popular as the official program of a chain of houses under the management of F. M. Brylawski. The little sketches of the plays to be witnessed are as helpful in the appreciation of the performances as the casts in the programs of the real drama. The fact that Mr. Brylawski brings out a number of first-time-shown pictures makes it possible for the people of Washington to see many of the newest films that are denied other cities. Arrangements have been recently made with a new circuit by which the Cosmos (a Brylawski house) will be furnished vaudeville features to intersperse the motion pictures equal to those at more pretentious and more expensive houses in other cities.

The managers of the motion picture theaters in Washington have solved the question of keeping the people in the city, despite the warm weather. By the use of a special appliance for pumping in fresh air and removing the stale air and then circulating the fresh by many electric fans, the people have discovered that the moving picture houses are the coolest spots in town. Even the suburban resorts with their bands have been neglected, because breeze and music and entertainment are all found nearer home. W. H.

A MONEY SAVER FOR MOVING PICTURE THEATERS.

Gummed Paper Letters and Figures, which are now being used by a large number of theaters for making their daily programs and announcements. The picture here shown was taken in Los Angeles, Cal., and shows a program in front of Tally Broadway Theater. This party has been using these letters for some time and considers them invaluable for this purpose. He claims he is saving from five to ten dollars per week over cost of the old method. They are also used for making cards for lantern slides. A call at their office convinced us of the demand for these goods, as they were shipping orders to all parts of the United States and they have received some very fine letters from different theaters recommending their use. The cost of the letters is very small and every theater should be interested. The Tablet and Ticket Company will be very pleased to send samples and catalogue on request sent to their address at 545 Jackson boulevard, Chicago.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

Questions and Answers.—Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

From San Francisco.—Dear Editor: Will I find in your book, soon to be published, everything about electricity that the competent operator should know? I have been operating several years and think I know my business pretty well, still, I need more knowledge concerning resistance—how to calculate the number of ohms necessary to give a certain amperage under a given pressure, what is the resistance, per foot, of different sizes of wire, etc., etc. I have read with much interest your account of the poor results shown on Eastern screens. I just wish you could view our work here in Old Frisco! You certainly would see some first-class work put up by our union men, and our president, W. G. Woods, is rather proud of the number of times he has been congratulated by visitors, who were authorities on projection, on the excellence of our men's work. Wages here in 'Frisco are high—perhaps the highest paid to operators in the whole United States and we fellows understand that we must give our employers a run for their money and we do it. Our working hours are limited to nine per day, with not to exceed six consecutive hours for one man. We have also assistant operators and apprentices (those under 21 years of age) and quite a few of them could give points to some of the crank-turners found in many other cities. Well, Mr. Richardson, I have to thank the Moving Picture World and yourself for the help you have given us all; operators, managers and exhibitors. I learn something every time the paper comes and several times have found in the Column the explanation of some trouble which had me all at sea."

Now that sounds good to Ye Editor. I am truly glad to know that the standard of both wages and work is high in 'Frisco. I am also glad to hear 'Frisco say that 'Frisco operators return good service for good wages. That is as it should be. I am led to believe, from the letter, that the 'Frisco union is a union in all the word implies and I heartily congratulate both the organization and its individual members. Now don't a lot of you operators, upon reading the letter, pull up stakes and rush off to 'Frisco for you will find you will have to deliver the goods (can you do it???) and, moreover, the union controls matters there. From the letter I should say that unless you are a real operator and a union man you had best steer your course around 'Frisco. As to the book; no, it won't teach you everything you should know about electricity, but it will teach you the rudiments, how to calculate resistance, etc. It won't tell you the resistance, per foot, of different size wires since that would be an impossibility without knowing the exact composition of each sample of wire. But I advise you to purchase the book, nevertheless. I think that where members of a union send in a club of a dozen orders, Mr. Chalmers will make some concession in price. 'Frisco's attention is called to another letter from another Californian city, in another part of The Column this week.

Speed.—Saginaw, Michigan, writes a lengthy letter based on the letter by Charles Young, Chicago, in April 30 issue, page 687. Saginaw asserts that he believes 48 turns of the crank (48 feet of film) per minute to be correct average speed. Says he finds sixty entirely too fast. Asks the Editor's opinion.

It seems plain enough, Saginaw, that Mr. Young's use of 80 per minute was merely in the nature of an experiment. As to my opinion it is simply that there is no set speed that will meet all requirements. Sixty turns per minute is supposed to be "normal speed." It will, however, depend wholly on the subject and the writer uses speeds ranging from forty to eighty per minute. Speed is and must necessarily be a matter dependent wholly on the judgment of the operator and lack of judgment on his part will frequently utterly ruin some of the finest scenes imaginable. Judgment and brains are in demand in the operating room and at no point are they in greater or more pressing need than in deciding at just what speed each action of a film will appear to best advantage, all things considered.

From the Golden West. California (city and name suppressed by request), writes a most excellent letter, as follows: "As a constant reader of The Column I take the liberty of describing the modus operandi at the house where I am employed. I believe results attained here go far to substantiate your contention that excellence of projection is quite possible Our theater is, I believe, one of the most expensive, artistic, strictly motion picture houses in the country. It is divided into two parts, neither of which in any manner clash with each other. It is my part —the operator's section—that I deal with. (I take it that California means the management is divided into two parts. Ed.) The operating room is 12 x 14 feet. It is equipped with every modern device for projection. A 1909 model Motiograph is the machine used, current either A C or D C. Machine runs by motor, as does the re-wind. We have our own generator, run by 5 h. p. motor. (Suppose California means that the circuit is A C and they transform it into D C by a motor-generator set. Ed.) Our curtain is a "Radio" screen, differing essentially from other "mirror" screens. "Our throw is 120 feet, size of picture 12½ by 15½ feet. Found that owing to brightness of the screen the ordinary machine shutter showed excessive flicker. I therefore installed (inside the machine casing, not in front) a modified three-wing shutter—modified as to measurement of the blades used in Powers No. 6 and Pathe machines, I mean. The result has been as nearly perfection as human ingenuity can devise, I believe.

In this house mistakes are neither encouraged nor countenanced. The management have instituted, for the operator, a system of merits and demerits, affecting both his standing and pay, which latter, in view of the requirements, is above the average. The operator is judged solely by results on the screen; nevertheless, at various times, the management—themselves experienced and capable operators —ask certain questions, and no matter how good the results obtained, it does not add to the operator's reputation if he is not able to give a logical and technical reason for whys and wherefores. Also a system of bells, buzzers, and telephone connect the operating room with "downstairs," and the least sign of a shadow or saffron tint in the picture is "buzzed" up to the operating room with a sharp rebuke. Breakdowns are not taken into consideration, it being the opinion of the management that a competent operator should provide against such exigencies before and not during the show. House lights are shown at the beginning of the afternoon's exhibits and at their close—at the beginning of the evening's exhibits and at their close—and at no other time; and all changes of reels are made—must be—in or under 25 seconds in a dark house on two slides. In five months we have had three shut-downs—once to change a grounded lamp, and twice through a parted splice—no shut-down consuming more than three minutes, and each one calling for a demerit and severe reprimand; and twice in the five months has the buzzer rung into the operating room to call the operator's attention to a shadow. I think that a not altogether bad record. In returning the reels to the exchanges, the operator is not allowed to cut a "V" in torn sprocket holes to save time and trouble, but must each time make a proper splice. Result, our Exchanges have, unsolicited, complimented our house, in writing, on the condition of returned reels.

In conclusion, our selection of pictures is carefully made, and with a view to catering to the intellectual and refined, and appropriate music from a ten thousand dollar pipe organ is played with each picture. The results of all this are that in a little town of 20,000 people—notoriously not a matinee town—carrying running expenses averaging $32.00 per diem, the "Idle Hour" is able to pay a handsome dividend; and that, I think, is the main object of a motion picture theater.

I might add that (on D. C.) I find 45 amperes 90 volts give me the best obtainable light, condensed through two 7½-inch lenses. The pictures have a stereopticon effect, are perfect in detail, and are essentially "living" things.

In closing, I feel that I must apologize for this too lengthy letter, and repeat that your own articles, and a recent review of the methods—or mis-methods—in vogue in the average Picture House have called it forth; and may I add that what is accomplished here may as easily be accomplished at any other theater exhibiting motion pictures, with a little care and forethought."

There is just one thing I do not understand about this letter. Apparently this house is running with but one machine, else why speak of 25-second changes? If this is so it certainly is a matter for surprise. In a house such as is described there should be two machines, with one spare mechanism, and the pictures should dissolve one into the other, the helper starting one machine as the end of the film appears which is running on the other. By this I mean the second machine should be started before the picture on the screen has entirely run out, thus dissolving the title of the new film into the tail-piece of the one running. Otherwise the letter describes conditions and practice which may well be carefully studied by managers and operators all over the country. Glad to hear from you at any time, California; come again.

Blanie Day, a moving picture operator who has regular theatrical style letter heads, writes from Sherman Texas, where he is employed at the Jewel Theater: "Kindly let me know just as soon as the Operator's Handbook is out. I am taking a correspondence course but want the book also since I feel that one can by no possible chance learn too much about his business. I am glad to see by The Column that New York operators must now be twenty-one years of age. [That was an error. The age limit is eighteen. —Ed.]. If the report is true concerning Salt Lake City, as stated in The Column recently, the brothers there should wake up and get busy real soon."

The book is "on its way" neighbor Blaine, and, while I make no more promises, I am sure ten days will see it ready for delivery. That letterhead of yours shows commendable enterprise, as does your desire for all knowledge obtainable. If more operators were as progressive, projection would soon be wonderfully improved.

In General.— Pasadena, Calif., writes saying many kind things about The Column, its editor and The World in general. Says if he only got The Column for three times the price of the whole paper it would be cheap. Says the majority of operators in Southern California, south of 'Frisco are turning out very poor work and need some vigorous stirring up. Suggests that the Editor do some "stirring" and assures him that some of the good men will combine to protect his "slats."

Your kind words are appreciated. As to conditions in Southern California, they are probably the same as elsewhere, with some few exceptions and some sections where the crank-turners have been partially weeded out. The rise of the motion picture business was so extremely rapid that it brought into it thousands of men and boys who had and have as much real knowledge of projection and its requirements as the proverbial hog has of holidays. "They are for the most part a self-satisfied bunch of ignoramuses who seem really to imagine they have learned all there is to know about the business. There are also very many who realize their lack of adequate knowledge and are not only willing but anxious to learn. With this latter class I have every sympathy, knowing full well that, in the past, the avenues of knowledge have been strictly limited. Many there are who have tried to teach but in most instances they have aimed their knowledge gun too high—have spoken in learned phrases and technical language and terms which the average man failed utterly to comprehend. That is what has caused the Editor of The Column's writings to be popular. He has talked in language the average operator or manager was able to understand. But avenues of projection knowledge are widening and soon he who really wishes to perfect himself in the art (for it is an art) of projection will have no adequate excuse for not so doing."

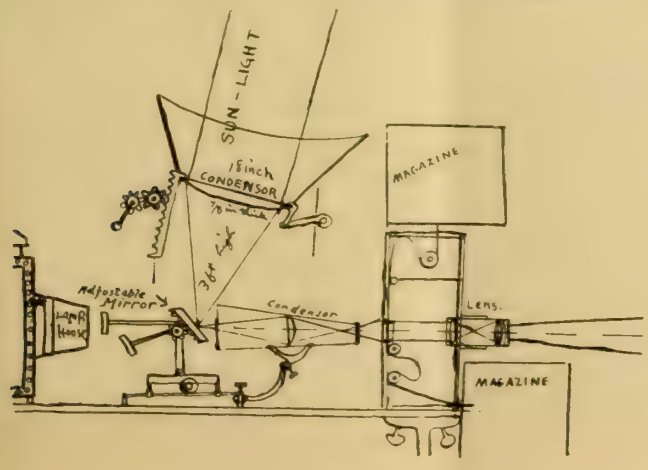
Sunlight Projection.—Chas. E. Boutros, St. Louis, Mo., writes: "I submit herewith a sketch of scheme for projection of motion, of stereo pictures by sunlight. I have tested this on a smaller scale and find it to work to perfection. After repeated experiment I have secured strong light which could be used for matinee performances. Of course the device would be of use only in daylight and on clear days. Please advise me as to whether or not you have tested this matter and if so whether or not you found it to be practical."



No, St. Louis, I have never tested such a scheme. There is no manner of doubt but that light fully as strong as the electric arc could be obtained, that being merely a matter of the size of the primary condenser, plus the clearness of the atmosphere. The light, I should say, would be softer than that obtained from the arc—more nearly resembling calcium. It would be interesting to observe the exact quality of condensed sunlight as applied to projection. No, St. Louis, condensing the light to necessary strength would be easy but when we come to the mechanical difficulties—that is quite another matter. If the sun were always at one point in the heavens the light could easily be made available, even though the machine set some distance below the roof level. But I have observed the fact that the sun moves, or the earth does, which amounts to the same thing. Considering this I believe you will readily see the difficulty in practical manipulation, remembering that your light must always strike the secondary condenser squarely. This proposition might be worth experiment by exhibitors in Colorado, Idaho, New Mexico and wherever the percentage of cloudy weather is very small.

Valuable (?) Information.—The following is a page from a catalogue of a New York City firm. The petrified gall of a firm presuming to print such rot and presenting it to intelligent men, labeled "information!" I only reproduce a part of it, adding one of the catalogue price lists, just as it appears. Let no operator plead ignorance after reading "Information An Operator Should Know," or any manager presume to lack knowledge as to the exact modus operandi of opening a "Picture Parlor."

HOW TO OPEN A PICTURE PARLOR.

After selecting your place and getting the architect to file your plans with the Building Department start and build the cash window and operator's booth as one part of the front. This arrangement will save you valuable space and space is money. Swinging exit doors on each side add to the necessary requests. Outside electrical display, white, red and gold paint make the most desirable effects.

Paper or paint the inside walls a dark green or red and embellish the side walls with painting or patriotic panels. All exits should be so marked and a red light burning at all times. Make your frame for sheet out of metal ceiling cornish mouldings, and if possible use furring and plaster boards for the rough, and a hard finish white plaster on top. This is superior to the muslin sheet as it makes the pictures stand out sharp and clear. A little gold paint on the metal frame will add to the appearance very much.

Arrange your chairs and aisles as per your plans, and if necessary slope the floor.

Information An Operator Should Know.

Q. What is Alternating Current?

A. A current that alternates. Burns around the carbons.

Q. What is direct current?

A. Direct current is a current that flows even and burns evenly.

Q. What is a Polarity?

A. The arrangement of your wires in the lamp house so the positive will be on top and the negative on the bottom.

Q. What is a Potential?

A. The ability of anything mechanical to do work electrical.

Q. What kind of fuses can you use in booth, according to law?

A. Amp. Screws fuses in a porcelain cut out.

Q. What are the principal qualifications a good operator should possess.

A. Cleanliness, Carefulness and mechanical ability.

Q. What would you do in case of fire?

A. Pull enclosed switch, put on house lights and dismiss the audience.

Through the Screen.—Flora, Illinois, asks: "Is it practical to project motion pictures to be viewed from the side away from the machine? If so what kind of screen is best?"

Yes. Use thin, bleached cheese-cloth and set your machine enough below the level of the curtain center that the audience will not see the bright spot of the lens. Above center will do also. If there is a balcony you will have to set above else those in the gallery will be looking straight at the lens, through the curtain, of course. You must put your film in machine with celluloid slide towards the light, instead of having emulsion toward light as ordinarily. Unless you do this all printed matter will read backwards.

Various Things.—Poplar Bluff, Mo., writes, in part: "Accept my sincere thanks for profit and enjoyment I have derived from The Column. Am running independent film in summer show, getting good picture at 80 feet in moonlight. Have been reading your articles on operators. There is an example here. The manager of the old, established house here conceived the idea he was paying his operator too much money. He fired him and employed a "student." Net result, bad pictures; business dropped off to about one-half, and do you know he hasn't tumbled to the trouble yet? Enclosed find rough sketch of how I run my machine with the motor of a sixteen-inch Emerson buzz fan. Motor speed 1,500, machine speed 50."

The woods are full of examples of the same sort of suicidal "economy" on the part of managers, Poplar Bluff. The sketch shows fan motor geared to machine by a worm meshing into one of the cog gears. The motor is below the table. The whole arrangement is quite clever but I don't quite see how the necessary change of speed on different scenes could be accomplished, unless a starting box be placed in shunt with the motor field. The machine is started and stopped by means of a friction clutch. Possibly speed might be regulated with it too.

A Few Last Words.—Aberdeen (E. J.) who in June 4 issue handed Portland, Ore., a "bundle" and to whom Portland replied later, again writes at considerable length setting forth the following: "That Aberdeen has the largest payroll on the Pacific coast and contains 20,000 population. That he never attempted to pass an examination for admission to a union for the reason that the occasion never has presented itself. That he visited some Portland houses, paying his way in, and found the projection very faulty. That he considers Portland the prettiest city on the coast and that he merely desired to call attention of her operators to the fact that their projection could be improved."

Thus much I have set forth in justice to E. J. He "went after" Portland pretty strong and Portland naturally came back with some ginger. The argument would now become merely personal. I am of the opinion that E. J. meant well but magnified the faults found in Portland. If Portland's projection is amendable to improvement (as it doubtless is) it is up to her operators to get exceedingly busy. Nothing but the best is good enough and the "best" is only had by hard labor and unceasing vigilance backed by proper equipment.

Again!—The Broadway Theater, Louisville, Ky., writes a letter a portion of which runs as follows: "Another thing we would like your advice about is this: When a figure in a scene is in motion, that is running or walking, there seems to be another figure, or shadow, immediately following the moving object. When the object is stationary, or there is reading matter, the effect is not there. It only occurs when some object is moving across the screen and it gives a jerking, or trembling effect, also the effect of appearing to be out of focus. Our curtain is the Mirror screen."

As regards the first portion of your letter, Louisville, I cannot for obvious reasons publish it. As regards the above described effect it resembles a trouble described by Iowa some months since, for which no adequate solution was discovered until the machine (not the same make as yours) was finally sent to the manufacturer when it was found that the star was loose on its shaft. Just why (I said at the time) a loose star should cause such an effect I do not know, but it did, in that case at least. In view of that circumstance I would carefullly examine the star, the cam-wheel and the cam-wheel pin of your machine. Plainly your trouble is not a travel ghost since that would be most in evidence when printed matter appeared. It is also barely possible that it is due to the shutter. It may not be out enough to cause a travel ghost but still enough to produce the effect described. Frankly I don't think that is much more than within the bare range of possibilities. I think you will find something loose somewhere. As to the stereo lens, I should say most emphatically that the company should either fit you out or else allow full discount for return of lens, in which case you could purchase a lens of proper focus. What you want is a "half size" stero lens of about 27½ inch equivalent focus. That is a very long lens and you cannot use a quarter size lens at all. You will probably have to pay a pretty stiff price for a lens of that kind. Bausch & Lomb, Rochester, N. Y., or Gundlach-Manhattan Optical Company, Rochester, N. Y., will quote you prices on application. I think the frequent pulling in two of the film is probably due to the "shoes" used on that make of machine, instead of sprocket idlers. I am not very familiar with that mechanism, however, and cannot say with certainty. Since you say the same film runs through your other machine without trouble, as well as through the machine of another theater, there can be no doubt but that the fault lies in the mechanism, not the film itself.

Small Town Location.—Illinois (name of town suppressed by request) writes: "Will you answer for a subscriber who reads every line of the World and likes it, particularly the Column, the following: (a) If I used old film and otherwise cut expenses, do you think I could make a moving picture theater pay in a town of 600 or 700 people, all coal miners, mostly Italians? They have no amusement of any sort, nor have they any street-car connection with outside towns. I would have no competition. Do you know of any town of that size supporting moving picture theaters? (b) Would the kerosene engine electric light plant advertised on page 214, July 23 issue, prove satisfactory for moving picture machine? I could not get electric light in that town. They claim it costs about 25 cents a night to run the outfit. How about it? Would such an outfit be practical? (c) Are Model B calcium light machines all right for motion picture machines? Note: I would run the proposed house as a side line; that is, I would not depend on it for my living. I think I could cut expenses down so that it would pay a little anyhow. If you know of no actual instances of theaters in towns of the size named, please give your opinion as to whether or no it could be made to pay."

I will answer backwards by saying that the Model B outfit is all right, but that calcium light is a rather poor substitute for electricity, particularly in the hands of a non-expert. It requires very expert handling to get good results, even on a small picture, with calcium. As to the kerosene engine and generator, I see no reason why it should not prove practical, but I have had no experience with it, and it seems to me to be very cheap if it will produce such flattering results as are set forth. Now as to the size of the town: Personally I don't like that "cheapen the program" proposition over well. No, I don't know of a town of 600 to 700 which supports a theater, nor do I believe such a village could, by any stretch of the imagination, be made to give paying support to a house running every night. If you get too cheap films, the whole thing will be a howling farce, and the people won't be over anxious to lend their patronage unless the admission be as low as five cents. Even then the running of junk will not prove highly entertaining. Suppose you succeeded in keeping your expenses (film, light, rent, janitor, ticket seller, ticket taker, music and operator) down to fifty dollars a week. That would require 1,000 paid admissions at five cents, or five hundred at ten cents. Could you get them, week in and week out? And that would be barely expenses! If you can get a suitable room at low rental, you to do your own operating, with your wife to sell tickets and a son or daughter to play the piano and sing the illustrated songs, you might make it go. That's the way it is usually done in very small towns. Or I would suggest this: Give performances two times a week, say Wednesdays and Saturdays. Put on three reels of fairly good stuff and one illustrated song by a good graphophone, and charge ten and fifteen cents. But any way you may work it, I doubt if, after expenses are paid, you will feel remunerated for your toil. Giving advice on such matters is difficult, since, after all, so much depends on the individual. I will tell you this, however: You will earn every cent you succeed in grubbing out of a proposition like that. I know a party who makes out well with a circuit of five small towns about the size you mention. He shows twice a week in the largest one and once a week in the others, does his own singing and entertaining and employs only one expert operator.

From Oregon.—Astoria, Oregon, writes in part as follows: "I believe I may claim to be an 'old timer' in the projection game, as I have had nine years at it, partly on this side of the Big Salt Pond and part on the other. I most heartily endorse your ideas as to good pictures and operators; but few there are, so far as my own observation goes, who deliver the goods. It is a crying shame the way good film is butchered up and the best efforts of the manufacturer brought to next to nothing on the screen by incompetency in the operating room! Many times have I felt really sorry for some crank-turner who was producing weird combinations of shadow, ghost and a war-dance on the curtain and tried to help him out, only to get snubbed for my pains. [I've been there, too, neighbor.—Ed.]. I don't blame you for working the hammer overtime. Let us hope it will wake some of them up! It has been my aim to at all times learn, study and improve my work on the screen. Being of an inventive turn of mind, I am usually experimenting to improve the picture or make my own work easier, and if any operator has an easier time than Yours Truly, I would like to meet him. I neither handle song slides nor do I feed the arc, these operations being performed automatically. This is not mere talk. I can produce the goods. I would like to have your opinion on the automatic arc feed and its value to the business."

Astoria's talk is "good medicine." If he has operated in foreign lands we would enoy reading his impressions of what he found there and how it compares to our own practice in this dear America. As to the automatic arc feed, I know of one man here in New York City who has perfected a device for the same purpose. I am a trifle skeptical as to its entire practicability in ordinary motion picture projection. Certainly if it can be made to do the work so as to produce curtain results equal to the hand feed it will be of value, since it would maintain the arc just at the most economical length at all times, thus producing more uniform illumination, probably at less total expenditure of current. That automatic slide carrier ought also to be of real value, provided it has sufficient range as to number of slides and makes the change without creating an undue "jump" on the curtain. I have seen an automatic slide carrier which performed the work all right, but there was too much jar to it, causing the picture to vibrate badly for a second or two after the change. That, of course, queered the whole thing. The automatic arc feed must be simple in its construction and operation to succeed. All those now available are too complicated.

MOTIOGRAPH MAKERS BUSY.

The employees of the manufacturing department of the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company, of Chicago, makers of the popular Motiograph motion picture machine, are wondering if they will get their usual Summer vacation, which at present seems rather doubtful. It has been the custom of this concern to shut down the factory for a two weeks' vacation in the dull Summer months, but since the 1910 Model was placed on the market, the sales have increased so rapidly that, in spite of the usual hot weather, increased manufacturing facilities and night work, they have been unable to accumulate stock; in fact, they say their orders have increased 50 per cent. in the past three months, and this without any inducements whatever, except the increasing popularity on account of its superior quality, and that they have not made a single exchange. If they are able to close at all for a vacation, it will probably be only for one week instead of the usual two weeks. It is gratifying indeed to learn of such unprecedented success, especially of a concern whose business methods are such as to command the admiration of all.

THE CHAMPION FILM.

We are always glad to have evidences of intelligent progress amongst the younger film manufacturers. By intelligent progress we mean a readiness to profit by the friendly criticisms of those who, like ourselves, make the art and technique of the moving picture almost our life study. The business of making moving pictures is so very, very young that most of us have still a great deal to learn about it. And from this generalization we do not exclude ourselves. On the other hand, we must say, however, that long study of the art and technique of the picture enables us to see at a glance if the work produced gives promise of higher things. We saw promise in the early work of the Champion Film Company, of which Mark M. Ditenfass is manager. Now we are passing from promise to realization. This week we had the opportunity of meeting him in conference, of learning something of the man and his aims, and we are convinced that in him the independent side of moving picture making has acquired a valuable personality.

The August 10 release of this company is called "The Hermit of the Rockies." The story appeared in our "Stories of the Films." From our point of view, who like to see a story worked out on the screen with no superabundance of characters, acting and the like, "The Hermit of the Rockies" possibly overcrowds the canvas. Nevertheless, from a popular point of view, it is probable such a subject will be liked. With the newer manufacturers, however, we pay comparatively little heed to the producing end of matters. That is bound to right itself in time, in virtue of the fact that the public will call for just what it wants in the way of subjects. We always look first to the photography of the film, because of our theory that though the subject may be not of a first rate kind, yet if the pictorial end of matters is, something will have been definitely gained at the production of a moving picture, mark the words, moving picture; not necessarily a play, but a moving picture. A bad photographic subject, of course, would be intolerable. A bad photograph of a good subject might pass, but a good photograph of an indifferent subject is certainly, we think, more tolerable than an indifferent photograph of a good subject. This, however, is a digression.

Mark Ditenfass's last August 10 release has produced a very good photograph indeed. The gradation of light and shade shown, the accuracy of tone in some parts of this picture, were faultless. We have never seen cleaner, more beautiful photographic work. The Champion Company has only to keep up this photographic quality to be assured of a distinctive success, and then with a tighter grip at the dramatic end of matters, unstinted business should await them.

POWER'S FACTORY BUSY.

Although this is the height of the slack season, the Nicholas Power Company is a little more than seventy-five machines behind on their new No. 6 mechanism. The company is now engaged in making extensive additions to their factory, it being evident that with orders beyond capacity in slack time, more facilities are imperative, else the company will be literally swamped when the Fall rush comes. Mr. Baxter Morton, general manager of the Nicholas Power Company, will sail for Europe soon, on a six weeks' combined vacation and business trip.

A GAS GENERATOR.

The H. & P. Manufacturing Company, of Chicago, have just perfected a gas generator that is destined to be of great assistance to the moving picture exhibitor in general and to the traveling showman in particular. As the outfit is compact, comparatively small in size and of a very reasonable price, it will prove a boon to the exhibitor, as the cost of generating gas will be about five cents per hour, against $1, the cost of the calcium light, and the light obtained through this generator is as brilliant as the light from an arc lamp. As this generator is built much on the lines of the regular gas generators used on motor cars, it is no experiment, but merely the adaptation of a good thing to motion pictures. The Capital Merchandise Company, of 225 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill., are the distributors of this very ingenious portable gas generator.

SHOWING THE PICTURE IN AGREEABLE SURROUNDINGS.

We have to thank a correspondent for sending us the program of the entertainment given at B. F. Keith's Bijou Theater, 545 Washington street, Boston, Mass. There are some features in this program which we should like to see availed of at other houses of entertainment where the moving picture is shown, therefore we append the full program for the information of our progressive readers.

The Bijou aims to provide a varied, artistic and wholesome entertainment designed to appeal to people of intelligence, presented amid well-ordered surroundings and offered to the public for a small admission. That the Bijou is a pioneer in demonstrating the artistic possibilities of the picture theater is the opinion of many discriminating critics. All who disapprove of the moving picture theater and do not believe in its existence, are invited to visit the Bijou, at 545 Washington street, when they come to Boston. Although we show motion pictures, we do not run a "moving picture show."

PROGRAM

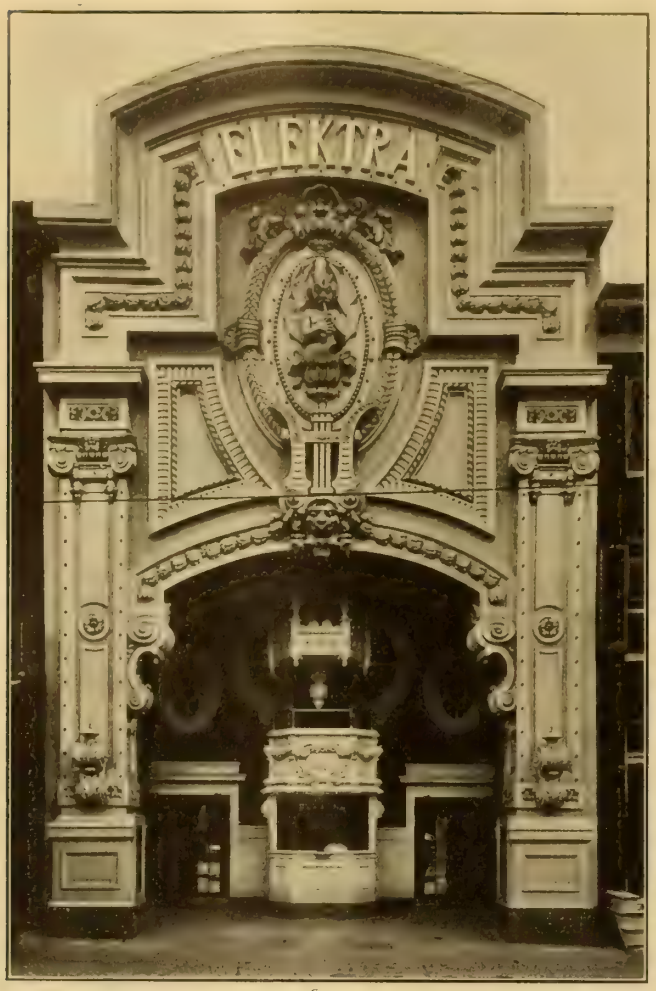
Motion Pictures at their Best
The subjects carefully selected, and including the work of the leading American and European producers

Camera Chats
By a trained reader, on interesting phases of life at home and abroad.

Stereopticon Views
Events of local and world-wide interest pictured in specially made slides.

One-Act Plays
Revivals and New Plays—the best example of the short drama, carefully produced.

Music
Vocal and Instrumental Solos; high-grade but not too classical; pleasing but not too commonplace.
A special effort is made to have music accompanying the pictures well rendered and interpretive.



ELEKTRA THEATER, BALTIMORE, MD.

This handsome place of amusement has recently been finished and opened to the public, and is staged for vaudeville and moving picture productions. The structure of attractive design and appointments is fitted up with every convenience and comfort for its patrons. The seating capacity of two hundred and fifty is amply provided for in a spacious hall tastefully decorated in tans and cream colors, and illuminated with electric clusters. The pitch of the floor is decidedly pronounced to give excellent lines of sight from every point in the house. Every precaution has been taken against fire, and a particular study has been given the machine room, which is isolated and ventilated in such a manner as to eliminate any possible danger in this part of the building. The exits are all spacious and conveniently arranged, and the acoustics of the hall have been pronounced a distinct success. The front, of bold and somewhat spectacular design, is in keeping with the purpose of the building, and is agreeably decorated in two tones of ivory and gold.

The building was designed by and erected under the supervision of Theodore Wells Pietsch, Architect.

THE NEW BIJOU, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Nothing gives us greater pleasure than the receipt of literature or information about up-to-date moving picture theaters, which seek to elevate the business of the picture by exhibiting it in the best possible surroundings and environment. It is a sign of the times that men of progressive minds are disposed to dignify the picture as much as talking plays are dignified, that is, by erecting handsome, well-appointed, artistic and comfortable theaters for exhibition purposes. We have recently received a booklet descriptive of the new Bijou Theater, at Springfield, Mass., of which Mr. E. L. Knight is the manager. This house was opened as recently as February last. It has a capacity of 1,000 seatings, therefore the architects and decorators have had ample scope for the display of their respective arts. We are particularly pleased with the notices to patrons which are printed in this booklet. For the information of "the brethren" all over the country we reproduce them for study and imitation:

"Exits.—Three large doors at front of theater leading from main floor to Worthington street. One large door each side of stage, main floor, leading to Phelps avenue. One large door each side of balcony, leading to Worthington street.

"Fees.—Any demand for fees, acceptances of money for seats by ushers or other employees, or any incivility or inattention of any attaches, will not be tolerated.

"Complaints.—The management, seeking above all things to please its patrons, will gladly and thoroughly investigate any charge of discourtesy preferred against any of its employees.

"Hats.—No head coverings to be worn in any seat in the auditorium.

"Lost Articles.—Articles found by patrons should be left at the manager's office. Said articles will be retained for sixty days, at the expiration of which time, if unclaimed, they will be returned to the finder.

"Physicians and other patrons expecting telephone calls should notify the chief usher.

"Ladies retiring room at the right of the main entrance.

"Telephone at the disposal of patrons can be found in the manager's office.

"Box Seats.—Private parties desiring box seats, can have same reserved by telephoning in their order.

"The drinking water in this theater is absolutely pure, being filtered by the Rapid Safety Filter Company.

"The exits are indicated by red lamps.

"This house is disinfected by the Damfino Disinfectant Company."

It will be seen that no effort has been spared on the part of the management to look after the comfort and convenience of the patrons of this theater. The auditorium seats are extremely comfortable, being wide and roomy and finished in leather, and folding up, like opera chairs. The stage is 30 by 20 feet, giving a permanent setting to represent a parlor. The singers' booths are on either side of the building. The color scheme of the house is white woodwork against pink salmon walls, the ceiling being in green, white and gold. The orchestra seats 700 people, the balcony 300.

As to the lighting system: To either side are the steps leading to the boxes, built to accommodate six people each, and on the fronts of these boxes are cartouches of light. More are placed above the curve of the balcony, and others in the scrollwork near the top of the columns shown in the picture on both sides of the building; above the ceiling still more bulbs are partially hidden and in the proscenium arch over the stage. By the use of these lights it has been found possible to keep the house moderately illumined without detracting from the impressiveness of the pictures thrown on the screen.

The building is heated and ventilated by a plenum system which comprises a six-foot fan operated at 150 revolutions per minute by an electric motor which draws in at the rear of the theater 15,000 cubic feet of fresh air per minute, which is heated to a comfortable temperature and is blown into the theater at very low velocity, through 120 openings under the seats on the orchestra floor and through the platform risers in the gallery; thus effecting a thorough distribution of the fresh air. The air entering in this way is warmed by contact with the occupants and by their exhalations and rises to the ceiling, where it finds exit through two large ventilators in the ceiling above the gallery.

BIJOU THEATER, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

INTERIOR VIEW OF NEW BIJOU, SPRINGFIELD, MASS., FROM THE BALCONY.

The operating room is 8 feet wide, 12 feet long and 7 feet high, constructed of angle irons and asbestos boards, pronounced by State inspectors to be the best equipped moving picture room in the country. The operating room is equipped with the finest moving picture machines; the dissolving stereopticon which is used in illustrating the songs is the best that can be procured.

We are glad to notice amongst other things that the Bijou possesses an orchestra under the charge of a musical director, consisting of first violin, clarinet, cornet, trombone, and drums. There is also a pianist.

A perusal of this pamphlet and a study of the interior illustrations of the Bijou persuades us that the management has omitted nothing to attract the patronage of the better classes of the public. The management provides for their comfort and gives people the opportunity of inspecting the pictures under the best possible conditions. We wish the Springfield Bijou a continuance of success. It is well deserved.

A timely suggestion in regard to increasing the attendance during the dog days is sent in by the enterprising manager of the Pekin Motion Picture Theater in Philadelphia, H. S. Reading, and as it may be of use to many of our readers the Moving Picture World takes pleasure in passing it along. After securing the addresses of as many as possible of his patrons and their friends, he had a number of complimentary cards and tickets printed, with invitations to an anniversary of the opening of the theater. The result was that numbers had to be turned away on the two nights that the tickets were good for, and he believes the permanent result was that their season began about August 15 instead of five or six weeks later. One thing that would add to the drawing power of this or any other plan would be to see that the theater is ventilated in the best possible manner and made as comfortable as possible during the warm weather. The success of many of the airdomes is proof enough that the public enjoy motion pictures equally as well in the warm weather if the theater is made fairly cool and comfortable.

SELIG HAS IT.

The film which will commemorate the great spectacle of the Knights Templar Conclave in Chicago on August 9 was the latest coup of the Selig Polyscope Company. Five cameras were stationed at the best points of vantage and from the 20,000 feet of negative taken we can expect to see a splendid reel. We understand that this film will be issued as a special on August 30 and as there is not a city in which it cannot be featured to advantage we predict for it a record sale.

MR. JOHNSON TALKS.

Mr. J. A. Johnson, a colored pugilist, who recently "defeated" Mr. James J. Jeffries, is a loquacious man. His loquacity is golden in that as a result of his victory he has been paid very large sums of money to talk on the vaudeville stage. More recently he has been induced to talk for the purpose of making phonographic records, which are heard in connection with the picture. In other words, Mr. Johnson has been converted into talking pictures through the agency of the American Cinephone Company.

As our readers well know, we are no particular admirers of these pugilists; but the other evening we sat and listened to Mr. Johnson talking in the production room of the American Cinephone Company. Orally, Mr. Johnson was a success; photographically and histrionically, Mr. Johnson was not a success. He just stood there on the screen, unaccompanied by the fistic gestures that we naturally look for, and quietly described his fight with Mr. Jeffries. As we have said, he did not suit the action to the word, and the result was some disappointment. Probably there were difficulties in the way of securing the best kind of photographic and acting results. We will make allowances, while congratulating the American Cinephone Company on its enterprise.

As we sat and watched the picture and heard the phonograph we seem to perceive possibilities in the way of topical talking pictures. Already we have the singing and talking picture in dramatic form, but so far the purely topical picture has not often been attempted or presented. But of course expedition will have to be used in these matters. It is now six weeks since the fight took place. Interest in it has not disappeared, it is true, but then the exhibition was of somewhat exceptional interest. Maybe in future times when a Mr. Roosevelt returns from abroad we shall be witnessing talking pictures of him that same night. Or, again, when any great public event takes place it will be phonographed and photographed and presented to the public within a few hours. This is some of the possibilities that lie before the talking picture.

A Bully's Waterloo

The ATLAS PHUNNY PHILM, released Wednesday, August 24, Came bursting in at a busy hour and, in spite of protests, began to cut up capers on the white sheet until every Mother's Son and Daughter had left their post of duty and joined in the Glad-fest. And, by the way, even the man who made the film roared with joy, and that's the surest proof of its power to please.

Then a storm broke when

began to unfold. Packed away on the same smiling reel. Frankfurters in vast variety, representing every canine breed and clan, were introduced by no less celebrity than Original "Johannes" who made the sausage famous, and whose troubles and trials were used as a basis for one of the most ludicrous, button-busting creations ever incorporated in a motion picture.

A DOUBLE-SUBJECT DOUBLE-BARRELED SCREAM REEL

The Usurer

"What Doth It Profit?"

The Biograph with this subject presents one of the most powerful lessons against avarice. A cold cruel usurer amasses a fortune as a money shaver. He fattens upon his victims' misfortune, they becoming his abject slaves. But there is sure to be the day of reckoning. Entering his large vault, he stands gloating over the well-stocked deposit boxes, when the door is accidently closed on him. Fitted with a time lock, he is at its mercy until the regular hour of its automatic opening. In the morning he is found a victim of the avenging hand of Providence.

THE USURER.—"Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt"—Mat. 6-19. How few there are that appreciate the truth of this advice from holy writ, in our incessant struggle for gold. Wealth is not only transitory, but it often conspires against our eternal salvation. "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." True it is that the fight for fortune is ethical where the methods are legitimate, but the one despicable means is that of the usurer or money shark. This man fattens on the misfortunes of his fellow beings, gloating over the fait that his debtors are his abject slaves, and like the ancient king who called for a reckoning from his servant, "But forasmuch as he had not to pay, he commanded him to be sold, and his wife and children, and all that he had—." This is the procedure of the usurer. We find him about to leave his office in the evening ordering his collectors to warn the delinquent debtors that if they do not pay by the morrow their effects will be sold. They start off on their rounds while he goes to spend an evening of pleasure at a banquet. What a contrast. On the one side the poor unfortunates apprised of their inevitable fate, while he and his friends quaff the blood-distilled wine, and regale themselves with viands paid for with the tears of the needy. The next day the collectors carry out the usurer's orders, and the plea "Have patience with me and I will pay thee all," is ignored. The bed is removed from under a poor widow's sick child; the household effects of a widower with one small child, are seized and sold and other cruel, merciless deeds are perpetrated. Still, in the time of all this misery our usurer is enjoying the best the land affords. However, there comes a time of his reckoning, and "woe unto you for ye devour widow's houses, therefore shall ye receive damnation." The poor man whose goods were seized, in desperation terminates his unendurable existence and here the blood of the oppressed cries to Heaven. The widow leaves to go to the usurer to plead mercy, and when she arrives at his office he is in the safe. The poor woman faints from exhaustion and, falling against the huge safe door, which stands ajar, closes it. Here he is imprisoned in his storehouse of blood-gotten wealth at the mercy of the time lock. Struggle as he may, his condition is hopeless, and so he falls to the floor of the vault suffocated. Of what value is his gold now? Will it buy him eternal happiness? No, for "we have brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out." The next morning when the time lock snaps, the usurer is found the victim of that great leveler, death.

WHEN WE WERE IN OUR 'TEENS.—Diplomacy is one of the most valuable traits in a man's make-up. By it he loses nothing and often gains much; besides, it prevents trouble. When we are in our 'teens, diplomacy stands us good in love's young dream. Tom did not possess this quality and when May showed to him her latest painting Tom said "Punk," for in truth he was anxious to discourage her hobby for painting, knowing full well that she would never become a great artist. Howard, his rival, was more diplomatic. He praised her efforts, and is at once the top-notcher in May's esteem. This perturbs Tom, and he at once plans to trip Howard up. Disguised as a tramp, he, with the butler's assistance, steals the painting and in the presence of May tries to sell it to Howard, who, not recognizing it as May's, calls it "the worst ever." May, however, knows her own handiwork, and seizing the canvas bids them "beat it" for as regards her they are both in the "in bad" class.

AN OLD STORY WITH A NEW ENDING.—Cupid has often started something he hasn't finished and possibly he hugely enjoys the disappointment of the victims of his folly. Miss Pauline Smith is forelady of the factory, and the girls, jealous of her, plan a practical joke, by placing one of her cards in a pair of overalls which they are getting ready for shipment. The overalls are later on purchased by a Rube who is recognized as the village Beau Brummel. He, finding the card, becomes "chesty," and immediately writes the following letter to the fair unknown: "Dear Miss—I found your name and address in a pair of overalls I just bought. Suppose we round up this romance by us two getting married. I know I could love you. Just say the word. Jay Downs." This letter is delivered by the mail carrier to the girl, who is highly indignant and answers: "Dear Sir—I don't want a silly noodle who gets mashed on a girl he never saw. I don't know how my card got in those overalls. I want a fellow who can afford something better than a 47c. pair of breeches. Yours respectfully, Pauline Smith." Result—Conceit gets a jolt.

THE LADY AND THE BURGLAR.—Professor Blackburn is an eminent lecturer, a man well past middle age. He has married a beautiful and charming young wife is very fond of the Professor, but ing young woman of whom he is deeply enamored. No clouds mar the Professor's marital happiness he is so engrossed in his studies and the preparation of lectures on Egyptian hieroglyphics that he does not respond sufficiently to the ardent devotion of his wife. Mrs. Blackburn is constantly importuned by a previous suitor whom she had rejected, and though she declines at all times to listen to the handsome Lothario, she refrains from telling her husband anything about his advances.

An automobile accident happens one day which has a great effect upon the domestic affairs of the Blackburns. A little girl is badly injured in the accident and Mrs. Blackburn picks her up and carries her to the child's home. There she meets the father of the child, a man of poor circumstances, whose appearance would indicate that he is of the lower strata of life. Mrs. Blackburn places the child upon the little cot in her room and sends one of the neighbors for a doctor and a nurse. When they arrive she makes arrangements with them for the care of the child, and instructs them to leave nothing undone for the comfort and welfare of the little one.

We now go back to the Blackburns. One day Mrs. Blackburn is waiting in the park for her husband to come along, when Ainsley, the rejected suitor, passes, sees her and accosts her. The Professor coming to the place of meeting, sees his wife in conversation with a handsome stranger, and for the first time in their married life jealousy finds a place in his heart. Mrs. Blackburn does not tell the Professor who the handsome stranger is, fearing to arouse the very sentiment which has, unknown to her, begun to tear the Professor's heart. The suspicions of the Professor are deepened when on entering the parlor one day he finds Mrs. Blackburn hastily concealing between the pages of a book a letter which she has just received from Ainsley. Mrs. Blackburn is angered at the reception of this letter, but does not tell the Professor anything about it.

While the Professor's mind is tossed between varied emotions of love and jealousy he receives a call to deliver a lecture out of town. He bids Mrs. Blackburn good-bye. It is evening, and as the Professsor leaves his home a rough-looking character, none other than the man whose child was befriended by Mrs. Blackburn, watches him as he walks away. The man's attitude indicates that he intends to burglarize the house. He steals around the back way and enters the rear window. While Dykes, the burglar, is filling his sack with the silverware in the dining room Robert Ainsley calls. He is repulsed and asked to go. He refuses.

While this scene is going on the Professor, who has forgotten a couple of books, returnes to the house, enters the library and hears some discussion going on in the other room. His jealous mind immediately forms the conclusion that Mrs. Blackburn is untrue to him. Now we see Dykes, who is leaving the dining room and entering the parlor. He is on the scene when Mrs. Blackburn and Ainsley are in a heated discussion, and when he recognizes Mrs. Blackburn he tries to help her out of the dilemma. When the Professor drops a book in his excitement in the next room Mrs. Blackburn realizes that her husband is at home and tries to get Ainsley away. She is afraid of his stepping into the hallway for fear that he would meet the Professor, and she is afraid of telling the Professor of his presence for fear that he might be unjustifiably jealous.

She is in a quandary what to do, when Dykes, the burglar, steps forward, places his gun to the breast of the undesirable Ainsley and tells him to leave the house in the manner that he (Dykes) entered. This Ainsley does. Telling Mrs. Blackburn to trust him, Dykes places his pistol on a chair and pretends to take her necklace from her throat. The Professor enters and is surprised at not finding what he expected. He quickly rushes to his wife's aid. Seizing the revolver he forces Dykes to throw up his hands. The Professor backs toward the telephone on the table. Mrs. Blackburn now realizes that the man who has saved her is going to be captured. Her quick wit saves the situation. By a clever ruse she effects the escape of Dykes. This is not a great worry to the Professor, for the fact that his jealousy was unfounded is the paramount consideration with him. A happy ending follows, the action of which is most convincingly and splendidly characterized by those involved in the scene.

THE ATTACK ON THE MILL.—First, the eye is introduced to the old mill itself, with a gay betrothal party in progress, and laughter and merriment on all sides. Suddenly the laughter is hushed by the martial tread of feet, and the smile of joy fades from the two young lovers' faces as the French soldiers march into the courtyard and prepare to defend the mill against the oncoming attack of the German army. The mild Summer afternoon has but half way run its course towards its western home when a wounded outpost comes staggering into the courtyard with the news of the advancing German army stamped upon his blood-stained forehead. Suddenly the courtyard is filled with the smoke of battle, and we know that the long-expected attack is on. In one of the rooms of the ancient mill old Merlier, his daughter and young Dominique, her lover, are huddled close together in mute terror and humble submission, while behind the barricaded windows of the room kneel powdered and blood-stained French soldiers, sullenly resisting the leaden onslaught of the Germans from without. Neither old Merlier [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that of being beat wondering what it was all we ever and dreading the result.

A leaden messenger of war has rudely kissed the brow of Dominique's sweetheart and slowly the red blood trickles down her cheek. Dominique sees it, and a savage impulse of defense seeps into his brain. He hurls one of the soldiers aside and, seizing his gun, smashes the window frame and stands there loading and firing with the determination that each shot shall reach the heart of a German soldier and teach him to remember that the woman whom Dominique loves is more precious to him than a thousand other lives. At sunset the French decide that to defend the mill any longer would be useless, and a hasty retreat is ordered, but Dominique does not hear them. The red stream of blood on his sweetheart's forehead is all that he can think of, and so he continues to load and fire until suddenly he is confronted by the German Captain and his officers, and into his ears are read these words:

"Any citizen of France bearing arms against the German army, not clothed in French military uniform, will be treated as a spy and shot without court martial."

He feels the warm, soft arms of his sweetheart around his neck, and then he is marched away to be locked in a room till the Germans have time to end his life in the morning.

Upstairs in the room above him old Merlier's daughter stands listening. She is thinking and thinking of the coming dawn. Silently she goes to the window and opens the inner shutters. The soft moonlight steals into the room. She decides to crawl down the ivy-covered wall to her lover below. Unfastening the window of her room with an old knife, she crawls down to the window below and knocks. Soon the two lovers are in each other's arms. After much pleading Dominique agrees to try and escape for her sake. They steal to the window. On the opposite shore by the great water falls can be seen the German sentinel passing back and forth in the moonlight, with his rifle on his shoulder. Dominique is unarmed. Slowly the girl takes from her bosom the knife and finally stretches it towards him. The lovers look into each other's eyes and they understand one another. Dominique takes the knife and prepares to leave.

An hour later and the head of a man appears above the rocks on the bank of the opposite shore just behind the waiting sentinel. A stone falls into the river—a muttered cry and the two men are locked in each other's arms in a terrific struggle. A knife gleams in the moonlight, and slowly the sentinel sinks to the ground, while young Dominique stands staring down at him. The alarm of Dominique's escape is given in the morning, and the body of the dead sentinel is brought before the commanding officer, together with the knife that was found beside him. Old Merlier realizes by his daughter's looks of terror and cry of fear that she is guilty of young Dominique's escape, and he takes the blame upon himself to shield her from the guilt. The commanding officer is relentless in his determination to capture young Dominique and gives Merlier the opportunity of finding him and bringing him back in order to save his own life. This, of course, the old man refuses to do, knowing what it would mean to two young lives. But his daughter learns the fact and seeks out Dominique in his hiding place. There she is forced to tell the man she loves that his life is the price of her father's.

The hour of execution has arrived, and old Merlier stands waiting for his doom, when young Dominique and his sweetheart return only to find that she has failed to save either one of their lives, as the Commander decides to make both pay the penalty of the crime. But the fate of war often changes with the passing moment, and it is thus that the ultimate close of the picture gives the audience a thrill of joy and surprise that were well to leave untold.

PICTUESQUE WATERS OF ITALY.—The travel or scenic film will fail in its true mission—to educate—unless those who view it can view it intelligently. But now to view the Italian lakes film intelligently. We are aboard a small steamer, on the blue waters of Maggiore, as it approaches the small village of Baveno, on the central western shore of the lake. The boat is crowded with tourists and sightseers, and all are looking at the pretty hamlet nestling at the foot of the mountains.

Baveno is a favorite resort by reason of the commanding view it gives of the Borromean Islands. It boasts of the Villa Clara, a handsome structure built in early English style, in which the late Queen Victoria resided for several weeks in the Spring of '79, and also the Crown Prince Frederick of Germany, in '87.

As one takes the steamer trip from Baveno to get a general view of the Borromean Islands, he passes in succession Isola dei Pescaori (Island of Fishermen), Isola Bella (Island Beautiful), and Isola Madra. This far off view, as shown in the Gaumont film, is simply superb, vista after vista passing before the eye with reawakening splendor.

Fisherman's Island, the first of the Borromean Islands to be touched by the steamer, is the home of 300 souls, chiefly fishermen and their families.

Along the shore, in the picture, fishing boats are seen with netting stretched, getting ready for the morrow. The shore of the island affords numerous picturesque glimpses.

But the piece de resistance of the film is centered in Isola Bella, which is beautiful from whatever angle viewed. This island was at one time a barren rock, on which might be seen a few scattered dwellings and a church. Count Vitaliano Borromeo changed the forbidding, sun-scorched rock into a beauty spot, a very fairyland. From 1650-1671 the building of the noble chateau that now crowns the island and the laying out of the garden which has become noted as one of the finest specimens of the old Italian style, occupied the time and taxed the resources of the Count. This garden rises in ten terraces from the waters of the lake, the highest being 100 feet above. It is stocked with lemon trees, orange trees, cedars, magnolias, ucalypti, laurels, cord trees, camphor trees and magnificent oleanders, besides numerous other luxuriant products of the south. Shell grottos, arbors and statues meet the eye at every point.

The huge chateau, the north wing of which was never finished, contains a series of handsome reception rooms, a famous gallery hung with 17th century tapestries and many other art treasures. As viewed from the lake in the Gaumont pictures, this grand old structure and the spacious garden are clearly seen, the spectacle being impressively noble.

Lake Mergozzo, a small lake on the highway westward along the north shore of the central bay, to the west of Lake Maggiore, is next visited. The pictures of this body of water are remarkable for the water reflections shown. These are so perfect that the picture could be inverted without marring the distinctness of outline or detail. The sublimity and grandeur of the mountain scenery here hold one with the force of a great epic.

THE WATER CURE.—Francois Beauchamp is troubled with a serious illness which drives him to a physician. His case is found to be serious and a cold-water shower treatment is recommended.

The medical light states that he ought really to take a cold shower hourly for eighteen years. Francois immediately hires an attendant to carry a spraying apparatus and see that he gets his treatment with proper regularity. He does, no matter where he is nor how many people are discommoded.

ENTOMBED ALIVE.—Among the crags of the Balkan mountains dwell a tribe of woodsmen who have for years been oppressed by the ruler of their country. At the opening of our story they are planning to capture the royal prince, both for revenge and to obtain a ransom for his return.

Next, we see their attack upon him in a defile of the hills. He is taken prisoner and carried to their camp beside a rushing mountain torrent, where he is bound hand and foot to a tree and left in charge of one of their number while the others go to their rest. Soon the sentry falls asleep.

During the night a young slave girl, who has been moved by the prince's sufferings, sets him free. The sentry awakes, but too late. The bandits pursue the refugee but are outwitted and fail to recapture him.

Meanwhile, the slave who had set him at liberty, is arrested and condemned to answer for it with her life. She is entombed in a cavern and left by the band.

The prince, who has escaped, arrives at the king's castle at the same time as the emissary sent to ask 100,000 florins for his ransom. The messenger is arrested and soldiers are immediately sent against the tribe, which is subdued.

The prince arrives in time to save the girl who had rescued him. He takes her to his father's palace where she soon becomes his wife.

DRIFTS OF SNOW IN CHAMONIX VALE.—High mountains, deep valleys, dense forests, open fields, all covered with so deep a spread of white as would sound ridiculous in a story. In the streets of the village your audience will see snow which reaches to the cornices of the buildings.

THE ESTRANGEMENT.—Two lovers, having been for a row, are seen landing from a boat. They wander along the shore and disappear from view. The following scene is the couple now married and to all appearances as fond of each other as before. A lady friend calls and the wife has occasion to leave the room, which occasion the man seizes to declare his love to the friend. His wife returns, catches him in the act, and orders them both from the house. Years elapse, but the love that husband and wife bore towards each other has not abated. Separated as they are happiness is denied them, but one evening as if led by fate, the footsteps of both are directed towards the shore where they spent so many happy evenings. The man recognizes his wife, so much older, approaches her and begs forgiveness, which, after a very weak resistance is given.

ACROSS RUSSIAN POLAND.—The second series of views in the realm of the Czar. The Cossack drills are remarkable.

We successively see the bridge over the Vistula at Warsaw. A regiment of Cossacks maneuvering. The Lazienki castle and a theater in the open air. The statue of Jean Sobieski, King of Poland, who does at Villanov in 1696, one of the greatest heroes of the XVII. century.

Villanov castle, built under Jean III. Sobieski, is the ancient Summer residence of the Kings of Poland. At last we see bison in the Bielovejo forest

THE SILENT WITNESS.—The granddaughter of an old paralytic is courted by two young men of the village, one of whom she accepts. The rejected suitor, in order to avenge himself, steals some valuables in the paralytic's home, the invalid being a powerless spectator of the robbery. The stolen jewels are then placed by the robber in the pocket of his happy rival, and thus the innocent young man is accused of the theft, and particularly charged by the one who himself was guilty of the robbery. The accusation is made in the presence of the old paralytic. His emotion upon hearing this lie is so great as to cause him to regain his speech and the use of his limbs.

The old man convicts the real culprit, and while the criminal is taken into custody, to the innocent he gives the hand of his granddaughter. One month later the wedding takes place and the dance is opened by the old man, now quite cured from his ancient illness.

ON THE BANKS OF THE ZUYDER ZEE, HOLLAND.—A perfectly photographed series of views which give the untraveled public an excellent idea of the lowland country of the Netherlands.

Scheveningen—The watering place, clearly photographed and showing some thousands of beach enthusiasts, grouped upon the sands, many in peculiar basket chairs.

Alkmaar (the great cheese market)—Introducing, probably, the largest stock of cheese ever photographed. The primitive methods of carrying, weighing and stowing are very interesting.

The Island of Marken—Bloomer-trousered fishermen, quaintly garbed children, full-rigged fishing boats, sharp-gabled houses, placid canals and clumsy tug-boats give the traveler a fair grasp of the entire life of the island.

THE PERVERSITY OF FATE.—A young girl, who is the secretary of a wealthy manufacturer, is burdened with the care of an invalid mother. The lover, a young engineer, with his career yet to be made decides to go to Canada and work out his fortune in the wilderness. Before he has been away but a few months the doctors decide that the girl's mother must be taken to a warmer climate in order to save her life. The girl is unable to take care of this extra expense out of her meager earnings and in her distress turns to her employer. The employer offers to marry the girl and take care of herself and mother. His offer is accepted.

Several years pass by and the lover who has gone to Canada has learned of the marriage of his sweetheart, and in his bitterness takes up with a young Indian squaw, whom he marries.

There comes a day, however, when the wealthy manufacturer dies leaving the young widow in a position where she believes herself free to claim her first love. She goes to Canada, finds him in the wilderness with his Indian wife and, although she uses every inducement and wile, he is too much of a man to desert his Indian wife and the young widow is forced to turn back heartsore and broken over "The Perversity of Fate" which has come between her and her love.

TRUE TO HIS TRUST.—The plot centers around a little pioneer family consisting of the father, mother, a little boy seven years of age and a little baby one year old. While the father and mother are away from the cabin working in the fields the little boy is left to look after the baby. Some Blackfoot raiders happen by but the little boy sees them in time to find a novel hiding place. He puts the baby in the well bucket and lowers himself with the baby to the bottom of the well. In the meantime the Indians ransack the cabin, loot it and after setting it on fire depart. Father and mother, who have heard the outcries and seen the flames from the distance, unhitch their horses from the plow and ride to the fort for help. A squad of soldiers ride back with them and after a sharp skirmish with the Indians the cabin is found in ruins. There is no trace of the little ones and the distracted parents of course think that the Indians have either murdered them or taken them away. Finally, however, the father hears the little boy calling and after a search the cries are located and the two youngsters are drawn up from the bottom of the well safe and sound.

THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S TRIUMPH.—The District Attorney is a young man, alert, fearless and without an ounce of romantic sentiment in his make-up just the sort of man to be attracted by a gentle, dreamy girl to whom King Arthur's knights are far more fascinating than the serge-coated men of to-day. To her the day of romance set with the passing of the bag wigs and knickerbockers; and when the District Attorney tells her of his love and asks her hand, she confesses that she likes him, but that she has her heart set on marrying a hero. The lover knows that he is no personage from a romantic novel, and is content to abide his time. He is busy with a murder trial and his eloquence and the careful preparation of his case bring about a conviction. Even in open court the ex-convict makes an attack upon the attorney for the people and is dragged away shouting that he will kill the others. There seems little likelihood that a man just convicted of murder can carry out such a threat, but the man escapes from his guards while being carried to the penitentiary where the death sentence is about to terminate his evil life, and the police are hurriedly dispatched to recapture him. Knowing nothing of the escape, the District Attorney takes the girl for a canoe ride, and when a storm comes up they seek refuge in the very hut in which the convict has found concealment. Taking a gun from the wall, the murderer is about to add to his heavy score, when he sees the police outside. A shot would bring them to the hut, and so, waiting until they have passed, the convict forces the young Attorney to enter the boat and follows after. With quick wit the young official overturns the boat, holds his captor's head under water until he ceases to resist, and then drags him ashore to turn him over to the police. He is not conscious of having done a brave deed, but when the girl reads the story she decides that, after all, there are heroes of to-day as brave as the ones who used to ride in armor in the good old days of romance.

THE DUCK FARM.—Taken on the famous Duck Farm at Allentown, Pa., the short industrial is a capital condensed history of the life of the duck from the instant the duckling breaks the shell until it lands in the cooling room, plucked and ready for the market. The pictures of the hatching are unusually clear and distinct and the entire subject is notable for photographic excellence and placement of the point of view. Ducks of all ages are shown by the hundreds, for this is one of the largest duck farms in the country, if not in the world in the country, if not in the world.

SHORTY AT THE SHORE. Shorty is a gardener, and a pretty bad one at that. To make matters worse, he works for a fussy family, and they are forever finding fault with the manner in which he does his work. Shorty's trampish pal suggests a way to obtain a vacation, and writes Shorty a letter announcing that he is heir to a fortune. The scheme works better than was expected, for the letter is opened by the boss in mistake, and that scheming employer decides that he will marry his none too lovely daughter to the gardener before he tells him of his good fortune. They suddenly become most amiable toward Shorty, and decide that he must have a vacation at Atlantic City. Shorty is willing to take a vacation anywhere outside of jail, and soon they are started on the trip. It is a pretty serious drain on the old man's purse, for Shorty is expensive in his likes and dislikes, and whenever there is any change he quietly pockets it or hands it to his chum, who has turned up on the boardwalk and joins the party. Only the thought that Shorty will pay back presently consoles the schemers, and when they discover that the letter was a hoax Shorty realizes that it will be well for him to go away from there quickly. He starts down the boardwalk, but lames his ankle, and the rest of the chase is continued in a roller chair from which the rightful owner is dumped with scant ceremony. The picture is rattling good comedy from start to finish, and the chase in the roller chair a real novelty.

THE RETURN OF TA-WA-WA.—After graduating from an Indian school where he has acquired an education and schooling in the ways of the white man, Ta wa-wa, a young Indian, returns to his native territory and far Western home. On the way to the tribe's encampment he stops at Vail's ranch, meets Kawista, his boyhood sweetheart, who greets him cordially and with a frank admiration for his gentlemanly appearance.

While they are exchanging greetings the postman enters and hands a letter to Mr. Vail from Col. Leigh, an Englishman, stating that he will visit the ranch with Lord Wyndham, an English lord who expresses a desire to see a real Indian powwow. He hopes Mr. Vail can arrange to have one "pulled off" for his especial benefit.

Ta-wa-wa promises to help matters along, and when he reaches the Indian encampment of his tribe he arrays himself in an Indian blanket and returns to the ranch with Kawista to meet Col. Leigh and his English friend, Lord Wyndam.

Col. Leigh with his niece, Rose Leigh, and Lord Wyndam arrive. As Kawista passes by Lord Wyndam is very much attracted by her; Ta-wa-wa is attracted to Rose Leigh and she seems to reciprocate his feelings. Kawista notes their glances, is suspicious and keeps her eyes open for developments, which appear when Ta-wa-wa is teaching Rose Leigh to ride and when Rose gives him her photograph which he carries in the bosom of his shirt.

Kawista tries to dispel Ta-wa-wa's infatuation for Rose, but her efforts are fruitless. Col. Leigh receives a letter which calls him back to England and Rose goes with him. Ta-wa-wa decides to follow her, and after he has gone Kawista, with the help of Nellie Vail, the rancheman's daughter, follows Ta-wa-wa to England. Ta-wa-wa reaches England to find Rose and Lord Wyndam just leaving the church where they have been married. He is spell bound and his mind gives way under the shock and disappointment.

ANOTHER SCREAMER

We do not have to say much about our Atlantic City pictures. It is enough that there is another one issued. Exhibitors know the extra business they create. Shorty is a capital story, most of the scenes being made on the board walk and beach and there is a legitimate excuse for a chase that is one of the funniest we ever did.

COWBOY CHIVALRY

A VIVID "WESTERN"

Cowboy Chivalry is an unusual western story, strong, stirring in every scene. Most of the action occurs in some exceptionally pretty locations. The story itself is strong and the care taken in the production brings out every point —one of the best western releases we have offered.

PATHE FRERES.

THE TROUBLES OF A FLIRT.—Rose, the daughter of a gamekeeper, is engaged to marry a country yokel, Peter. The vintage season arrives and all are working in the vineyards when an Italian balladmonger finds his way to the spot. Rose is attracted by his looks and cannot forbear throwing a saucy glance at him, despite Peter's sour looks, and later in the evening when he plays music for the dancing, continues to flirt with him. However, Rose is only a flirt, and when he sends her a note asking her to meet him she promptly refuses. Peter, however, fully believes that she has thrown him over for the handsome Italian, and enraged at being jilted, would harm her, but the gamekeeper intervenes, and with tactful management puts matters straight between the lovers.

HER PHOTOGRAPH.—The trouble began owing to Mr. Gayman's infatuation for a vaudeville star, who, in the due course of events, presented him with a photograph of herself in a part that required her to wear a dress that began low above and finished high below. What was more natural than that Mrs. Gayman, in the course of her wifely duties of going through his pockets, should discover it and throw it out of the window and substitute the photo of a demure salvation lass? How could the theme of this film be accomplished if little Willie and his big brother playing leapfrog outside had not found it and naturally took it home with them, where their papa quickly confiscated it? To describe the various adventures of this fascinating photo in detail would spoil the fun that even the most hardened exhibitor is sure to get out of the picture. But we will tell you that in the course of the story the photo passed through the hands of four men, two boys, one idiot, a negress, a clergyman and two policemen, and is discovered and thrown away by three wives and one fiancee. It eventually fell into the hands of a Bronx policeman. He, of course, being an honest man, took it to the station house, where the original soon appeared to explain it. But the desk sergeant was the happiest man, for he was the one who kept it for all time nailed above his desk.

THE RED GIRL AND THE CHILD.—Dick Sutton, a cowboy, leaving his wife and little tot of a daughter at his cabin, rides off to a jollification that is taking place at the store that in those regions fills the part of saloon, post office and grocery. On arrival he is just in time to stop Bill Duggins, a cattle rustler, from bullying an Indian squaw. Bill, sore, swears he will be revenged and on his way to his camp meets Dick's little girl going to the spring to obtain some water. Seizing her in his arms he quietly approaches Dick's cabin and fastens on the door a note to the effect that he had taken the child away in return for Dick's smartness to him at the saloon. The wife shortly after finds the note and rides post haste to inform her husband. Accompanied by the grateful Indian woman and all others present, Dick starts in pursuit of the renegade, and they are rapidly closing on Bill and the little girl, when they come across the child's skirt on which has been scratched with blood, "Follow and I will kill the kid." Frightened for the child's safety, they stop to consider, and finally the Indian girl disguises as a lad and starts off to try to get back Dick's daughter. She crawls quietly in the dark of the night up to Bill's camp, and taking the child, ties it on her back in her native way and starts back. Bill and his party soon find out that the child has been snatched away from them and start in pursuit, and one of the most thrilling chases across Western country ensues until at last the Indian woman hauls herself, with the child still on her back, hand over hand over a rope stretched across a wide and deep gully. On reaching safely the other side she turns and cutting the rope sends to the bottom her pursuers who had already started across. Rid of them, the rest is easy for the child of the plains and she returns the little girl safely to its distracted parents.

OLIVER TWIST.—Oliver Twist, an orphan apprenticed in London to a master who ill-treats him, runs away and is found wandering, famished and penniless, by Bill Sykes and The Artful Dodger, two of London's hooligans of that period. They take him to Fagin, the old Jew receiver of stolen property, who having provided him with a good meal, wants him to turn pickpocket and work for him. He is forced to start out with Sykes and the Dodger as instructors, and as a first lesson an old gentleman, Mr. Brownlow, is easily robbed of his watch by the Artful Dodger. Oliver had all the time objected to the crime, but he is the one captured by Brownlow and arrested. A storekeeper, however, overhears the truth when the two culprits are conversing outside his store and hastens to court in time to free Oliver, who is adopted by Mr. Brownlow on hearing his sad story. Some months after, when sent on an errand by his benefactor, he is shot by Sykes for refusing to aid him and his companions in a robbery. Fagin and his gang are, however, soon after this captured and imprisoned, and on his recovery Oliver visits Fagin in jail and forgives him for the wrongs he tried to do him.

MAX HAS TO CHANGE.—Max, having made the acquaintance of a millionaire, is invited to a social evening to help entertain the guests. The host's daughter falls violently in love with him and announces to her father that she means to marry him. Her ideas do not coincide with those of her father, who declares to that young man of genius that if he does not find some means of breaking it off he will blow his (Max's) brains out. Max politely refuses, but the barrel of a revolver brings him to a more amenable frame of mind, and we find him next day doing his best to destroy the good impression that the young heiress has of him. For some time the girl tries hard to believe that to dust boots with a serviette and to use fingers instead of a fork are but the vagaries of a genius. She, however, gets thoroughly disgusted when Max, feigning to be intoxicated, does some most outrageous things. She rushes out of the room, leaving her father convulsed at Max's antics. So thoroughly diverted is he and so excellent a fellow does he now find Max that he abruptly changes his mind and insists that Max must marry his daughter. Again Max refuses, but the ever-ready gun is whipped out, and at the point of the revolver makes his peace with the girl and confesses that he was compelled by her father to behave as he did.

BACK TO LIFE AFTER 2,000 YEARS.—A uniformed attendant is sleeping soundly by the side of a marble tomb, in which lies the remains of one of ancient Rome's mighty Caesars. The top of the tomb gradually slides off, and there emerges a fine old Roman dressed in classic toga. Shaking the dust from his feet, he sets out through the city, but naturally finds things have changed since he last knew Rome. Some of the crumbling ruins he can recognize; others he cannot. Finally he meets a picture postcard seller, who shows him cards with views of modern Rome. He is so delighted with them that he starts through the city to inspect, but the sight of two well-dressed girls captures his eyes, and soon making their acquaintance they all adjourn to a restaurant. Meantime the attendant awakes, and, finding the tomb empty, soon discovers the truth. He locates the old warrior in the restaurant, half asleep from the effects of the strong champagne. With the aid of two guards he places him in a wheelbarrow and they take him back to his tomb, where he is soon again at rest, and the heavy marble cover being replaced, the attendant falls back in his chair and is able to finish his own sleep.

A CHEYENNE BRAVE.—Red Shield, a Cheyenne, is madly enamored with the daughter of a Sioux chief, which love is reciprocated by her. But the Sioux and Cheyennes were ever bitter enemies and a marriage between them is not to be thought of, so when he offers ponies and fur robes for the hand of the maid he is promptly refused by her father, who informs him that at no price can he marry his daughter. Big Bear Claw, himself a Sioux chief, is the successful suitor for the girl's hand, and she is then given to him. Red Shield, however, follows on their trail, and on a dark night quietly awakes her and together they fly. Big Bear Claw and his braves soon take up the pursuit, and when Red Shield and the squaw take to the river in their canoe they soon follow in their fleet of canoes. After a long chase down stream they are unable to catch up, but when Red Shield takes again to land he is hindered by the girl, who is becoming fatigued, and is soon overtaken. Big Bear Claw, wishing to be generous to the girl, offers Red Shield that they fight for her, and after a long knife and wrestling fight Red Shield is victorious, and taking the squaw in his canoe sets out with her for the home of his people.

THE SHEPHERD'S DOG.—Jack, a shepherd lad, incurs the displeasure of his master by reason of his attachment to a little black poodle, which the elder man declares is no longer any good for looking after the sheep. The farmer accordingly purchases another dog, and then instructs Jack to drown his dog in order that a saving of food may be effected. Jack carries the dog to the stream, but his heart revolts at the idea of drowning his only friend, and he ties the animal to a tree. The farmer's suspicions are aroused when he sees Jack slip some of his food into his satchel, and, following the lad, ascertains the truth. Determining that the dog shall be drowned, he decides to do it himself, and carries the animal to an old wooden bridge where the current runs swiftly. As, however, the farmer leans against the rotten handrail it gives way, and he is precipitated into the stream. In a flash the dog has plunged in after him, and with his assistance is saved from the rapid waters. Shamefaced and repentant, the farmer owns up like a man to his unkindness of heart, and from that day Jack and his dumb friend are two honored members of his household.

SELIG POLYSCOPE CO.

FORGIVEN.—James Bartlett, pastor of the Vine Hill Church, meets and falls in love with Helen Mason, one of the parishers—oblivious of the early history of the Mason family. He is happy in the interest of his work—a devoted wife and a home made cheerful by an angel child who proves the tie that binds. The pastor's spinster sister, whose home is with him, finds ample time to offer suggestions and advice through her evident dislike to Helen.

In the early 80's John Mason was convicted of a crime and for ten years had languished behind prison bars, when one day he made his escape and found his way to the home of the minister for protection. Helen, fearful that her husband would become aware of the blight hanging over the family, gives him money, which was church funds left in her keeping. Her only impulse was to save her good name and help her brother to safety.

The husband sees their parting and forms a hasty conclusion, turns her from his door. With a breaking heart and a guarded secret in her breast she turns toward the cruel world, guided by the all-seeing power and her womanly instinct for the good and pure. During all this time she is persecuted by Jim Wilson, under threat of exposure, until life almost becomes a burden. In fleeing his unwelcome attention, she seeks refuge in the church, only to be pursued, her flight to the belfry and miraculous escape by the bell rope. She sees one evening through the lighted window her husband and little girl sitting in the parlor's study. She is so unnerved and broken hearted that she faints and her fall attracts the spinster sister, who had just entered the room. She at once goes to her assistance and carries her within, the latter, bringing her face to face with all that was once life and happiness. The Sister of Charity arrives with a death-bed confession from the brother that he alone was to blame—that he had forced his sister to give him the money and to keep his secret. A new light comes to the home. Mother, father and daughter, in one fond embrace, begin life anew and only sunshine and happiness shrouds the Little Vine Hill Church.

LOST IN THE SOUDAN.—Captain Iris and Lieutenant Payne—brother officers in the British army—are commanded to report for duty in the Soudan. Hasty preparations are made and the two young soldiers, with their escort, begin their weary march across the hot desert sands. They finally reach an oasis, where a halt is made and the long line of soldiers with their camels and horses are given an opportunity for a brief rest. A quarrel ensues between the two officers and the Lieutenant is struck down suddenly. Through the treachery of their Arab guide the camp is attacked, their horses and camels stolen and the soldiers are massacred by a hundred murderous savages of the desert. Believing the Captain to be the only survivor, the Arabs take him captive to their stronghold in the hills.

Years elapse. A caravan is seen slowly wending its way across the desert. It is part of Kitchener's victorious army passing over the Soudan. A strange creature is seen in the immediate foreground, a snake is crawling along the sands, the being raises his ensnared and is about to kill the snake when he espies the caravan coming towards him and immediately bounds away in fright. He is pursued by the soldiers, who bring him to bay in his cave on the hillside.

After a desperate fight the soldiers bring him out into the sunlight and find that he is a white man—one of their own race, but stark, raving mad. Hanging to the tattered rags upon his breast is a button of the British army. Was this poor, wild, raving creature once a British officer? The flag is fetched and placed before him. He sees it and pauses in his wild fear. Wildly he clutches the banner. The soldiers stand in breathless expectancy. Slowly he looks from one to the other. Something from the hazy past comes to him. Gradually he remembers—he was once one of them. The soldiers at last reach their home post. The desert has been robbed of its prey. The lost comrade has been brought back to life and love and civilization but who is he? The denouement is happy and startling and brings to a finish one of the best pictures ever made by Selig.

WILLIE.—Willie gets a letter from his best girl's papa in answer to his proposal for his daughter's hand, in which he reminds him of his inability to support a wife and suggests he go West and grow up with the country and then come and talk to him. Willie goes, takes a few ideas along with him regarding the invasion of the wild and wooly. He arrives at the Texas camp and is shown his bunk. Willie finds his silk pajamas are not adapted to the surroundings and the imitation of the rope and saddle not conducive to his early training.

It was a long, eventful night. Morning dawns and finds the tenderfoot on a bronco nothing like a Florida truck horse, who politely takes to the occasion and attempts a few acrobatic stunts. Willie arrives at the bunk house slightly disfigured, but still in the ring. He finally discovers his courage, gives the bully of the gaying cow punchers a good trouncing, floors the manager of the ranch, shoots up the place and returns East to claim the girl.

MR. J. H. HALLBERG, 36 E. 23d St., City. New York, August 2, 1910.

DEAR SIR: Several months ago I bought one of your "HALLBERG" Economizers and the MOTIOGRAPH M. P. machine, and wish to state right here that I am more than pleased with both of them.

The reason I am writing you is that I think you will be interested to hear what happened at my place last Monday night. Two inspectors called on me, and, after inspecting the booth, looking after the operator's license, etc., called me over to them and told me that I have the BEST pictures and machine in the Bronx, so you can readily imagine how proud I felt when praise like that came from people who know.

All my patrons are well satisfied with the pictures, as they are flickerless, and don't hurt the eyes, and for that reason I am playing to a full house daily.

Wishing you much success, I remain Very respectfully yours, tores and unaccustomed to the ways of the ultra monde, happens into camp and beholds Margaret, who breaks upon his astonished gaze like a vision of loveliness. Unused to the charms and graces of women of such refinement and higher birth, he is infatuated and at once enslaved by her beauty.

Margaret observes this, and for pastime and amusement plays upon Joe's susceptibility, and leads him on by her winning ways and practiced coquetry, until he is completely dazzled, like the poor moth flittering about the brilliant flame. His heart and mind are engrossed until the increasing passion of his soul bursts forth in a declaration of his love, and he wildly enfolds her in his arms and madly kisses her.

Margaret, with her husband-to-be and her father, leaves camp and returns to the city, where later on she marries. While her happiness seems complete—wedding bells are ringing and the nuptials are being celebrated—"Trapper Joe" is seen lost in a stupor of self-reproach and dazedly standing in the midst of a howling blizzard in his native forest. Suddenly his suffering bursts into a delirium, finally reaching a state of mental coma, in which he falls prone and helpless, soon becoming a victim of the relentless storm which enshrouds his body in a winding sheet of snow.

ESSANAY FILM MFG. CO.

THE COUNT THAT COUNTED.—Jimmy Little, a reporter for the Daily Howl, is in love. The object of his affections this time is pretty Dorothy Alexander, daughter of a millionaire, and this is the unfortunate part of it, because Dorothy's father suspicions the reporter of wanting the millions more than Dorothy.

However, nothing could be furthermost in the mind of Jimmy, and on the afternoon our story opens having received a note from Dorothy to call immediately and ask her father, he leaves the office and takes a car to Dorothy's home.

Dorothy and he fearfully approach the old gentleman in his study, but he mercilessly denounces Jimmy as a fortune hunter, and in the end the unlucky suitor is dragged to the door by the butler and pitched out on his ear.

Jimmy refuses to accept defeat, scrawls a brief note to Dorothy inviting her to elope with him and sends it in by the maid. Dorothy answers that he must first win her father's consent, and father, coming into the room as she writes, adds a postscript to the effect, "and if you ever do you can have her."

Jack Horning is interested in Jimmy's affair, and when Jimmy confesses his predicament to him, the star reporter immediately hits upon a lovely scheme. Jimmy, he announces, will masquerade as an Italian count and will, with promises of title and fame for the daughter of the soap maker, obtain the latter's consent.

Due publicity is given the "advent to our city of his lordship, Count De Soakum," and the article, concocted by young Horning, adds further that the count bears a letter of introduction to Mr. James Alexander, the millionaire soap maker.

That evening Jimmy, masquerading as the count, calls on Mr. Alexander, and is given a fine reception. The old gentleman not only gives his check of $10,000 to the happy couple, but also an ironclad consent to marriage.

Dorothy's father and mother then leave the young people to themselves and during their absence Jimmy removes his false moustache and goatee. This is a sad mistake, however, as a moment later father and mother return, and Jimmy, in endeavoring to get his facial trimmings restored to his face, sticks the moustache over one eye and the goatee on the side of his cheek.

However, Jimmy and Dorothy win out in the end when the reporter flashes the written agreement signed by father himself, "and if you ever do you can have her."

THE DUMB HALF-BREED'S DEFENSE.—Nellie Nixon, the half-breed wife of a drunken miner, and her brother, a mute, are waiting the evening homecoming of Nixon. His lateness means that he is drinking up his salary at the "Silver Dollar" saloon and fixing himself into an ugly frame of mind so he may properly abuse his half-Indian wife.

He is very much intoxicated when he enters, and reeling into a chair at the table pounds loudly for his supper. The frightened girl and her brother hasten to do his bidding, but their placid and meek submission and willingness to do for him only serves to make him more irritable, and finally rising with a scowl he aims a kick at the mute and ends in throwing the boy out of the house. Then he bolts the door and turns on his wife.

When the half-breed mute rises painfully and looks in at the window a thrill of horror shakes him at the scene inside. On the floor lies his sister, while the big brute of a husband, his black hands around her throat, is slowly choking her to death. The half-breed, with a cry of rage, puts his shoulders to the door, but it refuses to yield; then seizing a heavy timber he rams an opening in a lower panel and crawls into the shack.

Nixon sees him, and the two men are on their feet facing each other. Next they grapple and struggle about the room. The boy weakens and falls back against the table, but his hands close on a sharp butcher knife and with an effort he forces up the other man's arm and jabs the knife, hilt deep, into the man's breast.

Shortly after the capture the sheriff notifies the district attorney of the murder and the capture of the murderer, and the young assistant district attorney is sent to interview the boy. The boy is tearful and tries desperately to explain. The young attorney is finally convinced of the boy's innocence, and slapping him assuringly on the back returns to the district attorney's office.

Unable to write or speak, there is a tremendous handicap placed upon the unfortunate boy. However, in pantomime he explains to the attorneys how the husband came home drunk, how he choked and kicked him and his sister, and finally how his sister was murdered. The rest is explained, and to the complete satisfaction of the district attorney, who gives him his liberty.

ATLAS.

THE COUNT OF NOACCOUNT.—Tony the barber, with aspirations above his calling, has had ample opportunity, during the periods between customers, to acquaint himself with the fact that the overproduction of American heiresses and shortage of titled noblemen, is commented upon in daily papers.

Reading of Lawncrest, a mountain resort, being unusually well supplied in this respect, Tony conceives the foolish idea of masquerading as an Italian Count in the hope of capturing an heiress for a wife.

He purchases an impressive outfit at a second-hand clothing parlor, sends a telegram to the leading hotel reserving a suite of rooms, and sallies forth in his quest for wealth.

At Lawncrest, preparations for a hay ride were in progress when the bogus Count's telegram arrived. The landlord, proud of the distinction of entertaining the nobility, announces the fact to his guests. The hay ride is immediately postponed by the girls, much to the chagrin of the boys, who do not hesitate to show their displeasure.

The girls proceed to array themselves in their best in anticipation of the Count's arrival, and indeed make a decided impression when he appears upon the scene, as the events following bear out.

A woman's privilege is to change her mind, and when, after being formally introduced by the landlord to the assembled guests, the Count states that a hay ride would be a new experience to him, the girls immediately insist upon the original program being carried out, but now without any enthusiasm on the part of the boys.

During the ride the Count is the center of attraction, the girls showering him with their attentions.

Arriving at the picnic grounds, the girls treat the Count with the utmost consideration, while the boys are kept busy with the chores. Believing in the old adage, "Make hay while the sun shines," the bogus Count, taking advantage of the opportunities offered him, proposes to each of the girls in turn.

But it's a long lane that has no turn, and the boys are soon to come into their own again, and in a manner both satisfactory to them and embarrassing to the girls.

Bob, a brother of one of the girls, decides to spend a few days with his sister. Arriving at the hotel and learning of her absence, he decides to join the party.

He is enthusiastically welcomed by the boys, and the girls, proud in their possession of a real live Count, all wish to be the first to present him to Bob.

The introduction fills Bob with mirth and the Count with consternation, and Bob loses no time in divulging the fact that the Count is none other than Bob's barber, Tony.

Imagine the mortification of the girls and picture the exultation of the boys, who in retaliation drive off and leave the girls alone with their Count.

There is no anger like that of a woman scorned, or fooled, either, and what those girls did to Tony would require pages to relate.

Really, Tony did deserve a coat of tar and feathers; well, he received a substitute for it. A cushion furnished the feathers, and, in the absence of tar, the girls employed the jam forming a part of the interrupted luncheon, and treated the Count of Noaccount to a coat of jelly and feathers.

A BULLY'S WATERLOO.—You have run across him or his counterpart. Remember in the old days at school he swiped your migs, threw your cap over the fence, stuck his finger in your eye and whistled in your ear? He was always big and husky and how he would pick out the little fellows to have his fun with.

He grew up, too, even as you and I, and the only change noticeable was that he used more care in selecting his victims. Of course he got married—for did not this bring with it a meek, gentle little woman, always on hand to be nagged, abused, and yes, beaten, too, and with no danger to himself, for she keeps quiet and won't tell—don't want neighbors or relations to know she made a mistake.

Our Bully was no different, cast from the same mold and cut after the same pattern. Big, burly, blustering. He owned the town, or thought he did; it was a busy little town and perhaps no one had the time to devote to our Bully. He beat his wife, of course he did—wasn't she his wife—and regularly, too, just a sort of appetizer to start the day with.

The little newsboy had no business getting in his way—well, perhaps he did not know who Mr. Bully was or he would have been on the other side of the street selling his papers; and that some day he did lick a man—honest—a Chinaman. Hop Sing knew who was Mayor of the town but forgot who owned it. Old Tom was blind. It was a pity, otherwise he might have seen the error of his ways and kept out of Bully's way.

But we do have strangers visit us occasionally and especially during the Summer a stray city chap may drop in on us to spend a vacation. Nancy Lee was one of those real cute, manly chaps that wait on us when we go to the city—you'll generally find him behind some ribbon counter. Nancy was a sure enough stranger, otherwise he would not have dared stop off in the same town with our Bully. Well, mistakes will happen—poor Nancy got in Bully's way and something terrible happened to him. He burst the seam of a glove, lost a button off his shirt and disarranged his hair. Bully has not stopped running yet, but then Nancy did not know who Bully really was.

Bully never came back to our town. He was mortified after his encounter with Nancy. After much pleading on the Bully's part his wife finally joined him in his new home and we are reliably informed that he says yes ma'am and gets his wife's permission to go out.

THE TALE OF THE HOT DOG.—Honus, an itinerant vendor of frankfurters with no thoughts of establishing a permanent clientele but merely considering how much profit can be made on the least capital invested, apparently has cornered the market on all the old-time, left-over frankfurters in town, as this tale will unfold, and proceeds to work them off on the public.

At every Summer resort, in cities large and small, wherever the belated wayfarer may congregate, there we find the frankfurter man. Who of us has not at some time tackled the luscious hot dog in his lair and with more or less gratification?

But this is another story—not of the young puppy hot dog of to-day, but of those battle-scarred veterans of many campaigns.

The hot dog does not recognize race, creed or color, and levels all rank and class without distinction.

On this bright July day business was particularly brisk with Honus and he disposed of his wares in a rapid manner and in goodly quantities. It may have been the weather or it may have been the physical condition of Honus' customers, for strange to relate, each and every one of them, while at first gratified with their purchase, in short order reached the conclusion that they had been cheated and swindled out of an anticipated repast.

To start trouble only requires a leader and when the full enormity of the crime perpetrated upon them had been set forth by one of the victims, Honus' customers decided upon speedy retaliation.

One by one, in pairs and by crowds the victims joined in the search for vengeance. It was a long chase and a stern chase—but justice will not be denied. Honus was eventually captured and punishment meted out to fit the crime. Honus was obliged to eat each and all but one of his remaining wurst. The other one is what killed the cat.

YANKEE

THE GANG LEADER'S REFORM.—Chuck Westman was that type of plug ugly and strongarm man at one time prevalent in the city of New York, but thanks to the strenuous measures on the part of the police department, now almost, if not quite, extinct. A gang leader by reason of his abnormal brute strength, he held sway in a section of the lower East Side, obtaining funds to support himself and adherents in idleness by intimidating inoffensive merchants and other residents of the section to purchase tickets to fake balls and picnics, and which they gladly bought realizing that otherwise they would meet with physical violence.

Long immunity from punishment due to political pull, the result of his controlling and influencing a large number of votes, Chuck became callous and unmindful of the fact that just punishment must sooner or later be his lot.

These conditions also permitted a wide-open town, and in the days when the lid was off gambling places still existed in the Metropolis, and it was in one of these that John Stone, a society and business man to all intents and purposes, but in reality a sharp and card cheat, was caught at his tricks and exposed and thrashed in the presence of a number of friends, who formerly held him in high esteem.

Burning with resentment and not possessing the moral and physical courage to inflict a punishment he thought due his assailant, he sought out Chuck Westman in his haunts, to enlist his services in obtaining revenge.

Negotiations were satisfactorily made, but the cost was high and Chuck Westman, secure in the belief that he could easily earn the price offered without suffering any consequences, undertook, with the assistance of some of his gang, to administer a beating to Richard Harding, a wealthy young club man who had exposed and thrashed John Stone. But little did Stone or Westman reckon on the consequences, for Harding, a well trained athlete, when assaulted more than takes care of himself and with the assistance of nearby police puts his assailants to flight.

Harding possessing wealth and influence and also a determination to prevent further crimes of a similar nature, visits the chief of police and identifies the man who committed the assault upon him as Chuck Westman, by means of the Rogues' Gallery. An unknown or less determined citizen might not have received the consideration shown Harding and once again Chuck Westman might have gone scot free, but in this case it was policy to make an example of some one and therefore Chuck Westman finally met his just deserts. Captured in the rear of a low dive, Chuck after a violent fight temporarily eludes the detectives sent out to make his capture and seeks refuge in his own home; but orders have been given to these New York sleuths, "don't fail to bring in your man," and Chuck is finally captured on the roof of his home, after making a determined resistance.

Chuck's family consists of his mother, wife and infant child, who witnessing Chuck's capture realize that what they had long expected has now reached a definite conclusion. Chuck had never shown the slightest consideration for his family, but a woman's heart is a peculiar organ and, notwithstanding the neglect, abuse and beatings both mother and wife had been subjected to, this tough was a son and a husband and their agony was just as strong as though he was a respected, law-abiding citizen.

We pass over the trial, conviction and sentence of Chuck Westman, but fifteen years later he is discharged from prison, an aged, broken spirited man whose associates and political friends having deserted him when he could not longer give value received for their efforts.

Hungry and with no place to turn, driven from pillar to post, he is munching on a crust of bread taken from a refuse can when a young girl, noticing his condition, insists that he take her lunch. Long confinement and famine have made Chuck a weakling and with the assistance of a passerby his young benefactress insists upon taking him to her home.

Chuck's family in the meantime have prospered, they were enabled to remove to a more respectable neighborhood. As the child grew up into a comely industrious girl her added earnings made the little family more than comfortable. It was to this home that Chuck's daughter led him, for it was she who found Chuck starving and ill.

The past had all been forgotten and forgiven long ago. Chuck had had ample opportunity to reflect on the error of his ways while in prison and with an honest trade, learned during his incarceration, and a respectable and loving family to encourage him, he became and is now, what he never had been—a hard working, honest and respected citizen.

THE GIRL REPORTER.—May Merrill and Will Marshall are sweethearts and both reporters on the Daily Wave. Will leaves the paper to accept the position of private secretary to Blake, Commissioner of Public Works. Shortly after Will takes up his new work Blake is threatened with exposure and punishment on a charge of accepting a bribe.

In order to save himself, Blake makes it appear that Will is the guilty party. May is sent to investigate the matter for the Wave.

When she discovers that Will is accused, she determines to devote all of her time to clearing him, and with this end in view, she applies for the vacant position of private secretary to Blake. Assisted by Pete, a faithful office boy from the Wave, who follows her to her new position, May does some clever detective work and, clearing Will, manages to fix the guilt where it belongs, on the shoulders of Blake.

SHE STOOPS TO CONQUER.—The play deals with the love affair of two young people, both of whose parents are anxious that they should wed. Young Marlow is sent by his father to court the daughter of his old friend, Mr. Hardcastle. Marlow has spent very little time in the company of the fair sex, and as a consequence thereof is always shy and nervous in their presence. He, therefore, accepts his father's orders unwillingly and accompanied by his friend, young Hastings, rides out to meet his future bride. On the road the travelers meet Hardcastle's stepson, Tony Lumpkin, who, in revenge for a punishment his stepfather has inflicted, directs Marlow and his friend to the Hardcastle mansion, claiming that it is an inn where they will be well treated.

In the meantime, great preparations are being made at the Hardcastle home for the reception of the son of Hardcastle's old friend, and when Tony ushers in young Marlow, thinking Hardcastle merely the proprietor of the inn, he treats him with scant courtesy and orders him about, much to the older man's chagrin. Hardcastle has objected to his daughter's extravagant costumes, and she appears on this memorable evening dressed in a simple dress and wearing the cap and apron that housewives in the neighborhood assume. This costume greatly pleases her father, but leads young Marlow further astray. He immediately jumps at the conclusion that she is a most attractive barmaid and loses his heart to her in short order.

Upon the arrival of his father Marlow learns his mistake as regards the inn question, but flatly refuses to marry Hardcastle's daughter, claiming that she is too grand for him, and citing his preference for the maidservant. While in the act of making love to the supposed barmaid he is discovered by his father and when told that this is the young lady his father had intended him to marry, he is overjoyed, as he feels sure that his bashful disposition would never have allowed him to woo and win her had he known her to be a lady of fashion.

Announcement

The Dramagraph Company of America begs to announce to Independent Exchanges and Exhibitors that they have postponed releasing their first production until September, on a date to be hereafter announced.

We have taken this step, because we do not believe in burdening the exchanges with new films during this dull season of year.

Meanwhile the Dramagraph Company are busily engaged on a number of strong dramatic feature films which you should not fail to secure to stimulate the Fall trade.

sees what is needed and, setting out with a big basket, buys all manner of good things with which she returns to the sick room shortly before her husband, who has been considerably puzzled by the character of the neighborhood in which his wife's friend lives, arrives arrayed in splendid evening dress and carrying a large bouquet. His 1st sentiment upon entering the room is disgust, and he tries to persuade his wife to leave, but she coaxes his pocketbook from him, gives the notes which it contains to the woman and then, placing an apron around him, sets her husband to cleaning the fireplace, which he does with some damage to his face and shirtfront.

THE FIREMEN OF CAIRO. This film furnishes a curious and intensely interesting display of the exercises, drills, etc., performed by the Egyptian firemen, concluding with an actual fire and one of the most daring rescues ever accomplished. Excitement prevails throughout.

WHY DAD WAS HELD UP.—Indignation ran high at Jim Taylor's hotel. Gene Hardwell had just received a letter from his father, who not only refused consent to his son's marriage with Jim's daughter, Josie, but wound up by calling that young lady a "Western Miss Nobody" and added that he might be expected on the first train. The last sentence gave Gene hope. If Dad once met Josie, the young man felt quite confident all objections would be instantly removed. In this, however, he was doomed to disappointment. Mr. Hardwell absolutely refused to see Gene's fiancee, so there was nothing left to do but carry out the program they had planned in case all else failed.

Accordingly, when the old gentleman started for home, Josie rode with the boys as far as the stage station; then, while they hurried away to mask and make ready for the mock hold-up, the girl remained to await the coming of her future father-in-law.

As the old coach came lumbering up, Josie, traveling bag in hand, hastened out to be very affably greeted by Mr. Hardwell, who, as the boys had carefully arranged, was the only passenger.

Josie made the most of her opportunity as the stage wound its way over the hills, so that they had become fairly well acquainted when the boys dashed up, and at the point of their guns boldly demanded that the two passengers alight and with hands up march into the woods.

Here they were securely bound to a tree, and a note, which Eagle Jack rode forward to take, was thrust into Mr. Hardwell's face, demanding $50,000 of his son if he wished to again behold his father alive.

Then, after much shooting in the air, quarreling and yelling, the boys threw themselves upon the grass to sleep off the effects of a large black bottle, which, sad but true, had really been empty.

At this point, the leader, on the pretext of forcing Josie to drink, turned so that she could conveniently get his knife, and afterwards as conveniently lay down with the rest. Quickly the girl cut herself and her fellow prisoner free; then, to the great admiration and astonishment of Mr. Hardwell, stealthily relieved each man of his gun; brought them blinkingly to their feet with a shot, and, lining them around the tree, forced the leader to bind them and himself to depart; while she helped her companion aboard a horse, mounted her own and made good their escape.

As they disappeared from view, the boys dropped the rope, picked up their guns and shouted for joy—but, could they have seen Hardwell clinging to the neck of his horse as Josie forced him to keep up with hers, and his terrified face at her driving, even after they had changed for a buckboard at the stage station, they would have yelled even louder.

However, the finest part of it all was that they had accomplished their purpose. Mr. Hardwell's gratitude and admiration knew no bounds; and, when he discovered that this was the girl of his son's choice, he not only gave his consent but a very substantial check as well.

FOR THE SUNDAY EDITION.—A young reporter is informed that he can get a very good story for the Sunday edition of his paper by going to a certain water-front and getting evidence against some smugglers. He realizes that he will not be granted admission, and in order to fulfill his object he disguises himself as a convict, and upon his arrival discovers that the gang in question is led by a beautiful girl whose father had been killed while on a pirating cruise. The reporter, fearful lest he be apprehended and the story delayed for the edition, sends the manuscript by carrier pigeons, but is discovered by the girl, who immediately raises an outcry that brings the gang rushing to the spot. They capture him and put him into one of their storehouses. They contemplate doing away with him, and while they are discussing the best means of accomplishing their intention, the girl goes in and sees him sitting, dejected; it is the call of youth to youth, as of old; the ancient way of a maid and a man. She falls in love with him and decides to send one of the carrier pigeons to his office with news of his predicament, entreating the office force to send out a rescuing party. After, when he is at liberty again and is writing the story of the gruesome imprisonment and the rescue, he asks to know what accounted for his office associates understanding the need of assistance just at the crucial moment, and he discovers that the girl acquainted the office with the situation by sending one of her pigeons with the message. He goes to her and asks her to leave the robbers and come home to him and peace. The eternal feminine in her, her innate independence, revolts at the suggestion, but she is finally dominated by the man and goes back with him to pure things and pure existence.

THE TAMING OF JANE. The path to love and its bitter-sweet fruits is often a path of thorns. But he who would dare the bramble and brier for the blossom that lies beyond, is brave and bold enough to be deserving of the fair. A Westerner's daughter, full of the vigor and vim of the West—a tomboy in parlor parlance, out of pure mischief and with no thought of malice, finds a lot of satisfaction in forever discouraging the young man who is trying to make love to her. Finally she drives him to desperation, and he decides to lasso her and force her to come to terms. He catches her and takes her to the license office, but just as they are about to be married, she grasps the license and runs away. Again he catches her and ties her to a tree; her father comes along and unties her, gives her an empty pistol and tells her to shoot the boy for his cruelty. But underneath the rugged, wild surface of her being flares the flame of womanly tenderness. She has no more intention of hurting her lover than she has of pointing the pistol at herself and pulling the trigger. She points the pistol at the boy in make-believe, just when her father shoots his pistol. The girl thinks she has shot her lover. She succumbs in a wild abandon of grief, rants at herself, decides to turn over a new leaf when the father brings in the minister, who marries them on the spot.

A WOMAN'S BETTER NATURE.—During a skirmish over a card game in a Western tavern old Dunn Sikes is wounded. He, however, mounts his horse and manages to reach his cabin, but just in time. He falls to the ground and Sue, his daughter, runs to him—but he has gone on a journey "from which no traveler returns." Sue hastens to her friends, who return with her to bury her father. Mexico, a gambler, shows his tenderness for Sue, when he leads her away from the grave, and they become close companions. At the gambling room Mexico is planning to fleece two Easterners and counts on Sue to help. She refuses and is roughly thrown aside. She succeeds in hiding her pain, but decides she can no longer submit to such treatment and leaves a note telling of her determination to go away. When she reaches the city she is made sport of because of her western attire. She draws her gun and is left in peace. A policeman is about to lead her off, but Richard comes to her aid and whisks her away in a taxi. Three months later find her a happy bride and mistress of a luxurious home. One day as she and her husband enter their automobile, Mexico, down in his luck, goes by and determines to profit by his discovery of Sue. He later forces an entrance and extorts money from her. This he spends in a merry crowd and when the money is gone he returns for more. Sue declares she has none, so he takes her jewelry. She is grieved beyond expression and tells her husband all about it. When Mexico returns a third time he is met by Richard, who quickly, and none too gently, puts him out. Sue and Richard resume their happy, peaceful life.

THE REDMAN'S PERSECUTION.—Into the barracks rides an orderly, bearing a message to the commanding officer that the Indians must be forced to move southward, as the land is to be used for settlers. The officer confers with his soldiers and summons an Indian boy, to whom he gives word to bear to the Indian Chief, Big Hawk sends back the message that his tribe will not move. When this is heard the Indian policemen are called to arrest the defiant chief. At first Big Hawk refuses to listen to the policemen, but finally shows his courage and accompanies them, but leaves orders that Indians are to follow his trail. He still persists in retaining the land and is locked in a small house. To the Indian boy he tells of the others on his trail and at his dictation Little Snow writes that the chief is imprisoned and that they should release him. This Little Snow attaches to an arrow and shoots it through the air. It reaches one Indian, he reads it and shoots it farther, and so it goes until it reaches the camp. The Indians take their arms and rush off. Through Little Snow one or two of the redmen enter the barracks. They overpower the guard and others enter too. The soldiers meantime are up in arms and a battle takes place. The chief is rescued, but the soldiers drive out their foes. The Indians return to their camp and have a war dance. While at this the soldiers enter and they overcome the Indians. The redmen are obliged to take down their tepees and move onward.

THE POWERS COMPANY

A WOMAN'S POWER.—Frank Lane is a young real estate agent, conducting a profitless business in the office of I. Trimmer, a confidence man who sells stock in bogus gold mines. Threatened with arrest by one of his victims, Trimmer leaves town. He accidentally meets Perkins, a well-to-do farmer, and [illegible] Perkins [illegible] some [illegible] when Mr. Perkins [illegible] Lane, who [illegible] Trimmer settles to Lane to come up to Perkins' [illegible] and [illegible] with him some [illegible] [illegible] to work the old man for [illegible] Lane after a struggle with his conscience [illegible] to get into the deal.

He enters the Perkins' farm just [illegible] to rescue the old lady from the [illegible] of a cougar. The cougar was about to rob her. Lane makes a hit with the entire family, particularly with the daughter, Eva. When Lane talks mine stock with the old gentleman, the old man, impressed by Lane's honest appearance, decides to draw two thousand dollars from the bank and take the stock.

Meanwhile Lane has met the girl and in several picturesque river scenes we see the development of a love matter.

Meanwhile Trimmer, the fake, is watching Lane and urging him to get the money from Perkins. The old man draws the money from the bank, and Lane is about to turn the mine stock over to him, when the old gentleman leaves the room to get his spectacles and the daughter comes in. One look into her lovely eyes decides Lane to remain in the straight, honest path. He destroys the stock, telling the old man it is defective and leaves the Perkins' home, thinking that he is unworthy of their friendship. But the girl follows him, meets him on the road and persuades him to return with her. The young couple return to the home, where Pa gives his consent to their marriage.

This picture has a comedy climax when a boy enters with a note from Trimmer saying "You are a fool. No woman on earth is worth two thousand dollars."

THE GUNSMITH.—William Dale, a gunsmith, writes to his sweetheart in a distant city, that he has saved up a thousand dollars and that he is coming out to her home and end their long engagement in marriage. Maxwell, a cheap sport, reads the letter, and makes up his mind to get the money. That evening Maxwell, pretending to be drunk, staggers into Dale's shop and pretends to be asleep on the floor. Dale goes out. Maxwell steals Dale's hard-earned savings and is seen going away on a train.

Dale's sweetheart dies of a broken heart not knowing that Dale's failure to make her his wife was due only to the loss of his savings.

Seven years pass, and Dale learns from a friend that Maxwell is living in a distant city. Dale enters Maxwell's home, and drawing a revolver, is about to kill Maxwell. Here follows one of the most unique and powerful dramatic scenes ever put in a picture. Maxwell's wife enters the room carrying on her arms their baby boy. The baby turns to the gunsmith, puts its tiny hand on Dale's hand as if it were begging mercy for its father. Dale puts the pistol back into his pocket and leaves the room.

THE DECEIVERS.—Jolly, an old bachelor, rescues the pet dog of Mrs. Bluffer in the park. An acquaintance follows, which develops into a courtship, and the couple are engaged to be married.

One day Jolly calls on his lady love who has just had a quarrel with her French maid Fifi. The maid plans a terrible revenge. She goes to Mrs. Bluffer's dressing room, takes her wig, artificial teeth and the pads which have made her appear to be a very handsome woman, and brings them down and hands them to Jolly. Mrs. Bluffer, not knowing that Jolly is there, enters the room. Oh horrors! instead of the handsome Mrs. Bluffer, Jolly sees a thin, homely, toothless, bald old woman. Disgusted, Jolly dashes out, despite her pleas. The next day, Mrs. Bluffer calls on Jolly. He has removed his wig and his false teeth, and when Mrs. Bluffer enters unexpectedly, Jolly tries to escape; but Mrs. Bluffer grasps his hand and Oh! my! she holds an artificial arm. The couple look at each other angrily, then realizing that neither has anything on the other, they make up.

DEFENDER

SHANGHAIED.—When a fellow falls in love with a girl on sight it usually means an uphill fight, especially when he's got nothing but a fine, manly personality to offer as collateral for the joy of her hand. But faint heart was never given to Harry Wright, the artist, and so ardently does he woo the dainty Edna that he not only wins her but comes out of a session with her august father with flying colors. They marry, the honeymoon year rolls by on wings of bliss and a blue-eyed tot blesses the union.

The clouds of life are many; some gather slowly giving the wayfarer due warning, while others break out of the clear azure with appalling spontaneity and power. Harry's cloud is of the latter, for one day he is waylaid by ruffians not killed not robbed, but shanghaied! Carried aboard a vessel, commanded by ruffians, he is to be lost to the world, the world of his loving wife and baby, until destiny may liberate him or his stout heart break under the awful strain.

At home, the child cries for its father, and the distracted wife searches in vain. Even the police have given him up for lost. A few years pass. Wright is dead to them. A man, unconsciously an interloper has come into Edna's life. She is at a loss. Would it not be unjust to herself to go through life alone?

We are now taken back to the vessel. Harry is tortured by the heartless captain, for he will not submit. His bare back is lashed with thongs of leather, but he suffers on until in sheer desperation, after a mighty encounter, he jumps overboard into the sea. He strikes out blindly and finally reaches an island. There is no sign of civilization. He spends many weary days and nights in frantic vigil until finally the sign of a sail gladdens his heart. Shall we tell the story—how he is rescued and how he goes back to the old home, a tramp to all appearances, how his wife's admirer sees him embrace the child, and not knowing him, orders him begone. With a soul full of anguish, he turns his face back toward the sea, when Edna recognizes her lost husband and the first sunshine of five years bursts forth as the wanderer claims his own.

CHAMPION.

THE SHERIFF AND HIS SON.—Dan Moore, the sheriff's son, interferes in vain when his father orders his lazy uncle out of the house. They glare at each other, these two brothers, the one, stern with rage, and the other, scowling with hate.

The next day the sheriff is informed by a couple of neighboring cowboys, of a horse-thief in the vicinity. He at once prepares to catch him and issues orders for the assembling of a posse. His daughter tells him he'll find Dan over at the widow's, and with a wink and a smile goes over himself to get his son and warn the widow to keep her eyes open.

He finds Dan with an arm about Kate, the widow's daughter. It takes him but a second to interrupt their billing and cooing, although he does it with a smile and good-natured banter, for he approves of his son's choice; but there is business to attend to and he takes the young fellow away.

When they return they find the posse ready and waiting, and they are about to start when Dan sees the vindictive face of his uncle peering in at them. He scents mischief and refuses to join the posse, to the disappointment and rage of his father. He still refuses, but will give no reason even when his dad calls him a coward. He turns his back and walks away. His one desire is to save his father the disgrace he feels his uncle will bring upon him. With a shout of derision at the son who failed him, the old sheriff heads the posse as they dash off in search of the horse-thief.

Dan catches up with his uncle just as he reenters the widow's farm after a second horse, the first being hitched up just inside the door. Before he can interfere, however, a shot is fired—the uncle falls, then rises to his feet and staggers away. Dan, to save his uncle, hurries into the barn, just as the widow and her daughter Kate dash up, close and bar the door, the widow still holding a smoking gun in her hand.

The mother stands guard while Kate mounts the horse and hurries for the sheriff. The widow learns the identity of the prisoner, and when she is rejoined by Kate they determine that he must not be arrested, guilty or not. Kate forces the man she loves to bind both herself and her mother to the stall-posts, mount a horse and escape.

Meanwhile the sheriff's daughter has gone after the father, and all returning, find the women bound and the prisoner gone. The wounded brother manages to drag himself as far as the widow's kitchen, falling unconscious across the sill, where the women find him. When revived, he confesses his guilt and his nephew's innocence. The women then bind his wound and fasten him to a saddle. Then begins another chase after the sheriff and the posse who are again hunting the escaped horse-thief.

They meet the returning band with Dan bound in their midst. Explanations are offered, and the old sheriff, before them all, asks forgiveness of his son, while the tears roll down his cheeks.

What the Manufacturers Are Doing.

THANHOUSER NOTES.

A young man and a young woman are sweethearts, and reporters on the same newspaper, besides. The man resigns his position to become secretary to the Commissioner of Public Works. The commissioner is a crook, and, fearing exposure of his crookedness, seeks to fasten the blame for it on his secretary. The girl is assigned to investigate the matter for her paper—the girl against the grafter, eh, what? How's that to start a plot? Going some? It makes you imagine all sorts of interesting things that ought to follow. Some of them do follow. For instance, the girls wins—of course. But she does it plausibly, does it in that sane, practical way you have come to look for in Thanhouser productions. See "The Girl Reporter," released Tuesday, August 16, for the process.

The latest time-honored play-book to fall before the New Rochelle producers in their search for "Thanhouser Classics" is a comedy by Oliver Goldsmith—"She Stoops to Conquer." Of course, the picture is said to be done in the best Thanhouser style and to show Miss Rosemond and Frank Crane at their best. The costumes and setting are announced as notable. The atmosphere of the olden days is declared faithful and abundant, and the film as a whole seems just what a "Thanhouser Classic" should be.

LUBIN NOTES.

The Lubin Manufacturing Company announces for release the third week in August "The District Attorney's Triumph" for the 15th, and "Shorty at the Shore" for the 18th. The latter is an Atlantic City comedy and brings forward a new comedian as companion to the Lubin Company's taller funny man. "The District Attorney's Triumph" is a strongly dramatic story of a girl who wants a romantic hero for a husband and finds him in the man she had recently rejected.

The new costume department of the Lubin Company is one of the busiest places on the new factory site. Two professional costumers have charge of a large staff of operators, who are kept busy turning out material for the pending pictures and overhauling the old costumes. The costume room alone is almost as large as the old studio space.

It is expected that the new Lubin factory will be occupied the coming week. When the employees leave the old Market street place in the evening they will take with them their personal belongings and the next morning report at the new factory, where they will find a completely new equipment. In the matters of convenience, including light and ventilation, the factory building will be a model of its kind, while the system planned

Some of the comedy stories planned for forthcoming Lubin production are unique in theme and treatment. "Lubin Comedy" has become a trade name in the picture business, standing for productions in which there is comedy action in every scene, combining the humor or idea with the humor of action.

Four policemen were required to hold back the boardwalk [illegible] "Shorty at the Shore" was being made in Atlantic City and the "gallery" at times numbered into the hundreds. The picture is an [illegible] one in many respects, showing clear pictures [illegible] many of the most famous parts and concluding with a chase in a wrecked chair that made even the director laugh. It is to be released Aug. 18.

A very well-known leading man now playing in a Broadway production has a mania for making pictures and on a recent Sunday took in every picture show on the Bowery at Coney Island. In a letter to a friend in the Lubin Company he wrote that "Wine a Mamma" was not only the most favored picture along the famous street of amusement, but one that gave him real enjoyment. "Wifie's Mamma" was something of an ugly duckling in its early studio days, but it has scored a lasting hit wherever shown and is a splendid example of smart comedy.

There is always an insistent demand for short comedies and the Lubin release for August 25 will carry a double bill, "The Anarchistic Grip" and "The Dream Pill," the latter introducing many trick effects. "Cowboy Chivalry," a Western romance, precedes them on the 22d.

SELIG NOTES.

Owing to unusual demand for the poster for "Ranch Life in the Great Southwest," we were compelled to order a second edition that will be ready for shipment August 12. The sale of this poster was unprecedented in moving pictures, especially when taking in consideration the advance in price charged for this issue.

"LOST IN THE SOUDAN"—A SELIG FEATURE PICTURE.

Without doubt the film will prove a magnet for the hot weather and draw them in despite the fact of the torrid heat. It is far and apart from anything on the market and will prove a greater winner than either "The Range Riders" or "The Fire Chief's Daughter," both of which have caused a regular stampede in picturedom. This is a regular release for August 11th. The posters are the finest ever issued for a moving picture.

THIRTY-FIRST TRIENNIAL CONCLAVE

Knights Templar

Chicago August 5th, 1910.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN;

The Executive Committee of the Thirty-first Triennial Conclave, has awarded exclusive and protected rights for all moving picture privileges for this great event, to the Selig Polyscope Company of Chicago.

In making this award, we feel that no other film firm would be more successful in doing justice to this great subject than the Selig Polyscope Company, and we are confident that those who have the good fortune to be in attendance, as well as those who are unable to be present, will be greatly interested in seeing this memorable Conclave in motion photography.

Respectfully,

John [illegible]

President.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

The most familiar flower is the daisy, it has fallen to the skillful hand of the Vitagraph Company to weave it into a picture called "The Daisies" to show its importance in connection with college life and custom in the celebrated "daisy chain." The daisy has figured largely in the determination of cupid's choice, in the prophecy of its petals and the incantation, "he loves me, he loves me not." This furnishes the theme of the love story which the picture contains. The scenes of commencement day at Vassar College, in which hundreds of fair graduates and students make one believe that the title "Daisies" has to do with them, for they are all the title implies. This scene in itself is a big enough feature to gain the interest which is centered in the hero and heroine. "Daisies" will bloom and flourish on August 16 and a long time thereafter.

Some time in our lives we all like to go back to nature. Realizing this fact, a perfectly natural one, the Vitagraph gives everybody the opportunity of a lifetime by presenting "Back to Nature," where the dramatis personae find themselves whether they will or not. A shipwreck does the trick, casting all hands onto a desert island where they would have perished if it had not been for the brain and muscle of a young chauffeur, who builds a camp and otherwise proves his claims to their respect and the daughter of the consul who is in the party and who is so thankful for their escape from death and their ultimate rescue he gives the gallant driver his daughter and his blessing. We get "Back to Nature" Friday, August 19.

"Under the Apple Tree." All things happen in trees. Safe enough we have them in the good old summertime too. "Daisies," "Back to Nature," "Under the Apple Tree" and they all happen next week. Makes a fellow feel like getting right next to all of them, and the beauty of it is we can on August 16, 19 and 20. All three are enjoyable—the last of them, "Under the Apple Tree," on Saturday, August 20, is not the least. The last is just as good as the first and the first and the last and all of them are superior creations of Vitagraph life portrayals. "Under the Apple Tree" is a soulful story of a poor child finding friends and happiness under the old apple tree, where she is found later by her father, who finds a wife and a mother for his little one and the wife finds a father for her little ones.

Some very big things have been done at the studio recently. "The Battle of Hastings" employed two hundred persons in one scene and a battle of the Soudan War over two hundred, including a company of mounted English soldiers. The variety of Asiatic characters, Turks, Arabians, Egyptians, Zulus, Sheiks and Dervishes make this particular scene a marvel of realism.

"ROBINSON CRUSOE" FILMED.

A Realistic Subject by the Great Northern Company.

The Great Northern Company have probably never given us a subject which better illustrates their versatility and thoroughness in staging, than this adaption of one of the most famous stories in the English language. The representation of "Robinson Crusoe" is hedged with difficulties of no uncommon order, and the manner in which it is done is an example of the thoroughness, which from beginning to end characterizes the picture, which is a decided feature in every sense of the word.

The desire for adventure in the boy Crusoe leads him to neglect his lessons, and to be reproved by his father. Finally the boy packs his bundle and runs away to sea, a splendid view being given of the vessel on which he embarks at Hull hoisting sail and putting out to sea.

The vessel on which Crusoe sails on his last voyage for twenty-eight years, is wrecked. In a fine scene with a "rough" sea which is really rough, the hero is carried to the shore of the island. His first difficulty, that of lighting a fire, is solved by a flash of lightning, a very clever electrical effect, and soon we see him fairly accustomed to his new life, dressed in a robe of skins and living in a rude bower with only his goat for a companion.

The peaceful, if precarious, life is broken by the first visit of the cannibals to the island, and Crusoe is an affrighted witness of their weird dances about the fire. The escape of Friday is shown, the well-known scene being faithfully presented.

There is a particularly good picture of Crusoe in his hut at dinner, surrounded by his many pets, in the manner which every reader of the story will recall.

A final scene shows Crusoe going to the help of some pearl fishers who have visited the island and been attacked by the natives, and who in gratitude assist him to escape. Friday, with the parrot and monkey, and then Crusoe himself, are seen bursting in on the friends and relatives who for so long thought him dead.

This picture deserves great success, and is sure to be received with enthusiasm by all audiences. Therefore, no enterprising exhibitor should miss it, when it is released at the beginning of September.

KALEM NOTES.

The Kalem Company producers of late have shown a decided leaning toward Canadian themes, and the success of their earlier productions has brought forth one feature very pretentious, "The Perversity of Fate," the story of which starts in the United States. The scenic embellishments of this production are particularly beautiful and the Canadian scenes full of primitive splendor.

"True to His Trust" is the title of the other Kalem production for this week, and although it abounds in thrilling situations, its principal motive is one which will appeal to all who love children. A very novel touch is given the action by an insert showing the little boy and baby at the bottom of the well, while the Indian raiders are busy destroying the cabin.

LAEMMLE NOTES.

A good many exhibitors will be interested to know that a moving picture was taken of the departure of Carl Laemmle for Europe, June 7, on the "Kaiser Wilhelm II." It is an interesting picture and it wouldn't be a bad stunt for some enterprising exhibitor to secure a copy of it and put it on special, showing the public the president of the famous Imp Company, also the president of the exchange that made the word "service" famous.

The Laemmle Film Service right now is doing the biggest business in its career, in spite of the fact that the thermometer hovers around the 100 mark. This speaks well for the hustlers Mr. Laemmle left behind him.

"GIT!"

This is coming to you if you permit old "Gen. Flimco" to get a foot-hold in your box office. Don't laugh it off. A year ago I warned everybody that there was a deal on foot to freeze out the licensed exchanges. Some exchange men laughed. WHERE ARE THEY NOW? They are no longer owners of their exchanges, but hired help, keeping regular hours and bending the knee to old "Gen. Flimco". I tell you, Mr. Exhibitor, YOU ARE THE NEXT TO GO! And the only thing on God's green earth that can save you is immediate and absolute INDEPENDENCE! You'd be amazed to know how fast the exhibitors are turning Independent and how delighted they are with the fine Independent films now flooding the market. As I am the biggest buyer of all, I'm the man for you to do business with. You're doing a good business now. Very well. Insure it! Protect it! Don't wait for the boots.

Our experience has shown us that we may expect enough sample orders from this ad to bring our cost in express charges, handling, etc. so close to $200 that you may have the change,

But our experience has also shown us that these sample orders will result in such a clamor for "BIO" Carbons from exchanges and dealers, that we are taking no chances whatever.

Remember we spend money on every sample order. We can't make a profit until you are so convinced of the superiority of "BIO" Carbons that you will insist on having them.

We know that You will

If we didn't, we'd keep our money.

Pin your check for $1.50 to this ad and write your name and address and that of your dealer or exchange in the margin, and mail to our nearest office.

MOTION PHOTOGRAPHY

The most wonderful innovation in the amusement producing world is Motion Photography, however it has gone through many hard struggles before reaching that state of preeminent perfection. It has been the cry of the audience. "Yes the picture is good, but I am compelled to strain my eyes to see it," or "The theatre is so dark when the pictures are on that I cannot see to find a seat. or "The details are not brought out plain enough," or "If a person could see the expression of the face in the picture, it would unfold the story better," that all of these very vital defects were not conductive to comfort and pleasure one should expect when seeking entertainment at a place of amusement.

Many cities have taken up this question.. How can the Picture theatres be better lighted; it is not good for the moral conditions to have our younger people in a place that is pitch dark during a performance.

ALL OF THE ABOVE HAS BEEN ANSWERED! The eyes are not strained, but instead are rested The theatre is not dark—one can see a vacant seat on the farther side of the house. The details are so vividly stereoscopic that one can hardly realize that it is a picture, it looks so real. One can readily follow the story, as the expression of the face, the movement of the lips, the light of the eye, in fact one is looking at living, breathing, expressive reproductions taken from life and reproduced just as life is itself.

Dear Sirs:

The Mirror Screen we have recently installed in our demonstration room has turned out to our entire satisfaction. We find that the picture is brought out more clearly and that especially in the case of colored subjects, the different colors come out most beautifully.

We will be glad to demonstrate the advantage of your screen to anyone you may refer to us and remain, with best wishes.

Yours very truly,
PATHE FRERES,

Gentlemen: June 24th, 1910.

We have completed the installation and wish to say that the Mirror Screen is the most wonderful invention in the history of the moving picture business. It is the only screen that gives a perfect picture in every detail, so lifelike does it make the picture that every frown and wrinkle on the actor's face is minutely perceptible, and the actors seem ready to step out of the frame at any moment. Clear as a crystal, and are increased over 100% in brilliancy and beauty over the ordinary cotton or aluminum curtain. It will pay for itself for it will double our business in a short time.

Respectfully yours, (Signed) Louis F. Steuerle, Prest.

"A Woman's Better Nature"

A heart story of a western girl who emerges, through a series of stirring incidents, from precarious environments to a beautiful city manison, with a fond husband to protect her. A story with a moral, showing that a girl's inherent sense of right will, if followed, lead her to eventual contentment.

"The Redmen's Persecution"

The encroachment of the white race upon the vast lands used as hunting grounds by the red men marked a series of the most cruel Indian wars in the nation's history. This subject has been carefully worked out, being a faithful reproduction of the soldiers' barracks in pioneer days; the habits of the Indians; their resentment at being forced westward, and their thrilling battles with the boys in blue resulting in the eventual defeat of the savages.

"Imp" Bulletin!
"Imp" Bulletin!
"Imp" Bulletin!

We now announce two more "Imps" which will not only set you fairly wild with delight but will cause exhibitors to jump over to the Independent side by the dozen. If your exchange cannot give you these two glorious examples of American ingenuity, skill and art, then, Mr. Exhibitor, you are quite the easiest mark in the business if you don't switch your trade to some wide awake exchange AT ONCE. Now read the rest:—

FIRST—A ROARING COMEDY

"THE WIDOW"

This is a sequel to our record-breaking film entitled "Fruit and Flowers" released last May. E. Henry of the Lyric Theatre, La Salle, Ill., wrote:—"Fruit and Flowers got my audience going some. I thought some of them would have to be carried out. They nearly rolled off their seats. It was the best comedy I have ever seen." From all parts of the country we were showered with similar praises. Now, then, "THE WIDOW" is a sequel to that great film and IT IS EVEN BETTER IN EVERY DETAIL. It tells a story of a peach of a widow, two men in love with her and then —the iceman. For heaven's sake watch for the iceman. "The Widow" will be released Monday, Aug. 29. She will be about 1,000 feet long. You'll love her. You'll scream with her. Get her! Get her! Get her! Write your exchange NOW—in advance.

NEXT—A CORKING DRAMA

"THE RIGHT GIRL"

Here you'll see some stagecraft that will cause you to marvel at "Imp" films and their never-failing perfection. You'll see why it pays us to spend twice and three time as much as any other manufacturer for the best performers in the business. You'll see why we have hit the bullseye bang! bang! bang! with every film we have shot at the market. You could run this film repeatedly and your folks would not tire of it. Beware of the exchange which gives you an excuse instead of this "Imp." Begin to ask for it this very day. It will be released Thursday, the first of September. It is about 990 feet long. START!

THE MASCOT OF COMPANY D

The rescue of the Captain's little son from the Redskins is one of the scenes in this interesting subject, which abounds with critical situations of the times. The finale, in which the Indians are exterminated, is startlingly realistic.

KIT CARSON

By a heart-breaking ride, the picturesque scout saves the settlers from a covert attack by the Indians. The battle at the little stockade is bitterly fought, and the arrival of Kit Carson with assistance ends the unequal conflict, the savages are routed, and the burning of their tepees furnishes a spectacular ending to a reel of breathless interest throughout.

"Shivery Shadows" and "Munsey Myths."

We wouldn't miss our monthly Munsey for worlds Munsey is always bright, readable and snappy. It is never dull. Its fiction is first rate, and its pictures of pretty actresses always attract us. And being interested in the stage, we always read the article on the stage, contributed by Mathew White, Jr. "Mr. White" gets down to his subject in a workmanlike way, and tells us why plays succeed, and why they fail. They fail, of course, because Mr. White's friends the managers don't know a good play from a bad one. There are plenty of good plays about. The thing most conspicuously lacking, however, in the American theatrical world to-day, is managerial intelligence. Half a dozen men of the type of the late Mr. Mansfield, or Mr. Daly, had they been living and working to-day, would have saved the American stage from its present position of pathetic ineptitude and failure.

Last week we told a certain professor of philosophy to mind his own business, which is the teaching of philosophy to agricultural students, not the maligning of the picture. We do not wish to be quite so ungracious to Mr. White, Jr., of Munsey's Magazine, because, we respect him for his obvious abilities, his fairness and impartiality. But seriously we wish to remonstrate with him in the kindliest manner, for printing the following rubbish in his article on the stage in the August number:

> As to the moving picture rivalry, the outlook is more encouraging, in the sense that this big absorber of low-price patrons appears to have done its worst. Already the "picture" houses are introducing more and more vaudeville "turns" into their programs, and no less an authority than Marcus Loew himself—the moving picture king, as he is called—is quoted as saying:
> "The manufacturers of films have exhausted their ingenuity and skill. The only thing I fear is that the films will deteriorate."
> The one certain appeal of motion pictures is that they are cheap. It is inconceivable that any amusement-seeker would prefer these shivery shadows to flesh and blood performers, at the same price. As a novelty, of course, they created a sensation, and as a preservative of actual events their value is incalculable. But the cupidity of their purveyors has sought to widen their field into that of drama itself, and playwrights are now especially employed to "write"—save the mark!—"pieces" for film use.
> Cut off from dialogue, these plays require almost as much ingenuity on the part of those who see them as from those who make them. In any case, they call for the most undivided attention from the spectators. Even in the flicker of an eyelash one may lose the whole thread of the thing, making the rest of the story utterly incomprehensible. Thus an evening spent in viewing picture plays is apt to prove anything but recreation to the "tired business man." For my part, I cannot well conceive of anything more calculated to produce "brain fag" than the effort to keep track of the goings on in a film drama.

It is desirable that we should remove some of the false impressions which the foregoing extract may possibly disseminate. To begin with, we hope that Marcus Loew is incorrectly quoted, for it isn't true, it most emphatically is not true, that "the manufacturers of films have exhausted their ingenuity and skill." Bless your innocent little heart, brother White, it's all the other way round, as this week's copy of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, which we are sending to you and to Munsey must demonstrate to you!

For the information of the readers of Munsey, we hope that the few following facts will be incorporated in the article on the stage in the September number of that publication. There are twelve thousand moving picture theaters in this country devoted to the exhibition of "shivery shadows." The prices of admission range from five cents to a dollar. Writers of the calibre of Richard Harding Davis, Rex Beach, E. W. Townsend, write the "pieces." Mark Twain, before his death, consented to the film dramatization of "The Prince and the Pauper."

If Mr. White loses the thread of a film story it's his own fault, for not paying attention to it. If he gets "brain fag" by looking at these pictures, there is something wrong with his eyes. He should go and consult an oculist.

Sometimes, we get really angry with splenetic critics of the picture, of the professorial type denounced last week. But in the case of Mr. White we write more in sorrow than in anger. We are really sorry that a man of his great ability should allow himself to write in our favorite Munsey, such nonsense about the picture. The picture hasn't hurt the stage, or that which is good on the stage. On the contrary it has simply stepped in where the stage failed to make good, by providing millions of people, with a cheap form of entertainment, embodying all or at any rate most of the best qualities, of a stage performance. There is no rivalry between the silent play and the talking play. The latter will always succeed and hold its own in the ratio of public favor accorded to it. So will the moving picture, so will the automobile, so will the aeroplane, etc. These things supply public needs and wants. The public may not need the moving picture, but it most assuredly wants it, and so long as it wants it, we shall consider it our duty and make it our business to defend it, from such unfair attacks as that printed in our own, our very own Munsey for August.

Picture Men in Congress.

The film business of the United States to-day has very few representative organizations charged with the duty of looking after the business as the whole; of accelerating the scientific, popular and industrial progress of the picture. The F. S. A. is dead; it did nothing in particular; did it very well; and so gave up the ghost, poor thing! The Alliance and the various little exhibitors' associations, are, no doubt useful in their way, but they are scarcely of national or international importance and, therefore, have little or no influence on the progress of the picture. In short, as we have already said, the American film business is without any representative organization.

These ideas are suggested to us by the receipt of the program of the first International Congress of Cinematography to be held at Brussels early next month. At Brussels just now, by the way, a great International Exposition is in progress, which gives opportunity for the holding of the cinematographic, or moving picture, congress. On the list of the organizing committee we see many well-known names. Amongst the members, and corresponding members of the Congress, are the principal European exploiters of the picture in its best aspects.

In a preliminary note the organizers of the Congress state that the primary objects of the gathering are to consider the rapid growth and extension of cinematography; the place which this comparatively new industry occupies in modern activity; the scientific, commercial, and other applications of the moving picture, and generally the conduct of the business in its various aspects and applications. All these matters were to be discussed or rather are to be discussed, at a series of meetings extending over four days.

It will be seen, therefore, that in Belgium, at any rate, the picture is taken as a serious proposition. Our European neighbors realize that the industry has reached a stage when it must be regulated in the interests of those concerned. The outcome of this Congress will probably be some kind of an agreement on many points, between those occupied with the scientific progress of the moving picture industry, in Europe. If only as a means of exchanging ideas, the Congress will no doubt perform a useful purpose. Probably when future International Congresses are to be held, representatives from the United States will find themselves amongst the members present. There are none in the list before us, which, no doubt, is due to the fact that the Congress was hastily arranged.

By the way, the photographers of the United States are thoroughly well organized in respect of congresses and conventions. Nearly every State has its photographers' convention. There is also a National Convention, which meets in a different city each year. Last year the National Convention was held in Rochester; this year it met at Milwaukee; next year it meets at St. Paul. These conventions have great beneficial influence on the progress of photography.

In respect of the moving picture field, there is a lot of work to be done in the way of getting those interested annually together for common profit. There is room for a moving picture convention in each State, and a peripatetic national convention. When we come fairly to consider the organizing work, that has to be done in connection with picture congresses and conventions, it must be conceded that so far only the surface of the possibilities has been scratched. We shall be reverting to this subject of moving picture conventions and congresses on future occasions.

The "Dime Novel" Picture.

More "Newspaper Neurasthenics."

We were gratified but not surprised that an article of a few weeks ago under the caption "Newspaper Neurasthenics" should have attracted some attention, amongst our brethren of the press. After all, newspaper men, take them in the mass, are just plain people of the world, dealing with the facts of everyday life, in a common sense manner. In modern parlance they have their eyes skinned to the facts or rather to the truth of things. If they haven't they ought to have.

This is where we are falling foul of them in the interest of the picture, which it is our duty to exalt. We may say it is not merely our duty, but it is our pleasure in virtue of the fact that the picture plays a large part in the uplift of modern life. In other words the picture is a humanizing agency. Were it not so, were it not appealing to the same cast of brain in Central Uganda as it does to ourselves on Twenty-third street, New York City, well, we should have nothing to do with it. It is the humanism of the picture, the humanity of the picture that appeals to us, first, last and all the time. Thus one of our critics:

"What, indeed, is the moving picture show but dime-novel literature flashed on a screen by means of magic lanterns and purveyed to youthful minds pictorially for half the old price? It is in the dime novel that its enormous popular vogue had its source and it is by dime-novel standards that its moral influence must be measured."

Dime novel be hanged! Any intelligent student of modern work, who reads our pages week by week, will admit that the dime-novel subject, so far from being in the ascendant, is not even conspicuous or obvious in the list of either the releases of the Licensed and Independent manufacturers. Here we are tempted to go back on ourselves and ask what is a dime novel? Merely a record of stirring stress adventure, containing the usual amount of human ebb and flow and experience. A dime novel is not necessarily more bad than is the second chapter of Genesis. We would like, if it were possible, that our contemporaries all over the world, should clear their minds of cant, misconception and ignorance. The moving picture, as we have said over and over again, is a supreme factor in the entertainment of the people. It has stepped in at a moment when meretricious melodrama has failed. Call it "canned drama" if you like, call it anything. The fact remains that it supplies the writer of this article and the editors of this paper, its countless readers, and the great world to which the paper appeals, with something that the ordinary theater does not offer, namely, a cheap, wholesome, delightful form of entertainment.

Finally, to dispose of the absurdity of the "dime-novel" accusation, will it surprise our critics to learn that recently one of our chiefest delights was to see the Edison "Alice in Wonderland" on the screen? Then, on the little slip of paper before us as we write this article, are the names of two imminent releases, "Robinson Crusoe," and "The Scarlet Letter." These are not, were not, dime novels! If we could enumerate the religious and biblical subjects recently filmed, we might be accused of being a proselytising agency.

No more, gentlemen, please, about the "dime-novel" aspect of the moving picture! Any newspaper writer who to-day tells his readers that the moving picture is necessarily a "dime-novel" subject is guilty of either ignorance or fraud. No intelligent man on a modern newspaper should be unaware of the fact that the moving picture is the complement or, better still, the supplement of the ordinary stage. We are rather modest in this claim! We think it is equal, if not superior to, the talking stage in the estimation of the people. Assuredly in the commercial aspect of things it attracts more people night by night, and day by day, than the ordinary stage. Therefore, by simple parity of reasoning, it has got the ordinary stage beaten to a frazzle.

It is the "dime novel" otherwise the cheap melodrama, which has killed the ordinary stage, in the estimation of many millions, who are flocking to the moving picture theater, because, the "dime-novel" subject is conspicuously absent therefrom.

Warning.

Two weeks ago one Berger advertised in all the trade papers a set of slide pictures of the Jeffries-Johnson fight. The advertisement was subtly worded to lead the reader to believe that motion picture films were offered. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD being the only paper that refused to print the ad. without words being inserted making it clear that slides and not films were advertised. Complaints that have reached us show that a number of exhibitors parted with their money expecting films and could get no satisfaction from Berger when they found out that they had been duped. THE WORLD gave Berger opportunity for explanation. He ignored requests to submit the slides for examination. He paid no attention to letters of complaint. Therefore THE WORLD has placed these complaints in the hands of the proper authorities and warns its readers against sending any money to Louis J. or John S. Berger until they have received and examined the goods they order.

Eloquent Pictures.

We have often heard of "speaking" likenesses and pictures, being perfectly aware that this description only denoted a very "lifelike" appearance. The living pictures are not only "lifelike" but life itself, only lacking in actual audible voice.

How then is it possible that living pictures can be "eloquent"? This is a reasonable question; in answer the writer would first say that an appeal through the eye may often produce results not produced by an appeal to the ear.

Many a speech, talk, or even sermon has fallen far short of producing the results the speaker sought, often not even producing an impression; this may be true also of pictures which fail to arouse anything more interesting that a casual survey; nevertheless the fact remains that in their proportion living pictures may in some instances be as eloquent as the human voice.

What is eloquence? While the dictionary may help define the word, such a definition is theoretical, requiring its fulfillment in practice to make it real. Elocution is often mistaken for eloquence, but elocution does not go far enough; elocution is a correct form of speech pleasingly rendered, yet permissible without further effect, even as a beautiful picture demands admiration but gives nothing in return.

Eloquence is more than elocution in that it moves and inspires people, thus producing results. That speech which has its effect upon the mind and actions of its hearers may justly be called eloquent. In like manner, those pictures which produce the same results, first by holding the attention of the eye, then impressing the mind, arousing the will to action, may justly be described as eloquent pictures.

It is not essential that pictures must be either the one or the other, they may be either or both; many a speech is in part elocutionary and eloquent; such a speech is a masterpiece of oratory at once pleasing and moving; thus a series of pictures that fill these conditions of pleasing and moving an audience may be said to have attained the highest rank of perfect work. The attaining of such a standard shows the highest possible art and stamps the producer as a true artist. In looking over the picture galleries of the world we find that those pictures which fulfill these conditions are those whose painters became famous and their works everlasting.

In attending moving picture theaters the writer has noticed how pictures most nearly approaching these conditions received the closest attention and the best comments, the jury of the human mind is singularly perfect. Is it necessary to be reminded that eloquence is of two kinds, good and bad? It may be safe to be so reminded; power and responsibility go together; power without care of responsibility is dangerous; power with the balance of responsibility is safe and wise. The orator who uses his abilities to influence for good is a benefit to his fellowmen. Without going into any details, we have read of people being moved to both good and bad by moving pictures; if for bad the fault often lies with the evil trend of the receptive mind. There are people so careless of consequences, and so defiant of results that they too readily see only the mischievous and act upon it, such we trust are in the minority. True eloquence, whether in language or picture, is uplifting and it is a worthy ambition for both actor and manufacturer, as also the exhibitor, to give a receptive minded public eloquent pictures.

The Picture in the City of Fun.

By Rev. W. H. Jackson.

New York is a city of cities; nowhere else is it possible to find such definite divisions of life as are to be found within the limits of this one metropolis, each division comprising a city in itself. Briefly classified, these cities are commercial, religious, domestic and pleasure giving: While one city is devoted to fulfilling its reputation as the second commercial center of the world, another is called the City of Churches and Homes, while the third is given up entirely to pleasure and may justly be called the City of Fun.

Coney Island is probably the only place of its kind in the world, this statement being justified by the fact that no matter from what part of the world the traveller comes, or how exalted his degree or station, a visit to the City of Fun is always included in the itinerary. Furthermore, it may be said that Coney Island is one of the most visited spots on earth. Visitors to New York seem almost without exception to consider it absolutely necessary to "visit Coney" or "do the Island" before returning home. Indeed, one's reputation for credibility would be doubted who would visit New York and return home without having experienced a "night at the Island."

How different the Coney Island of to-day from that of fifteen to twenty years ago is common knowledge. True, many of the old crudities remain, as do also a few of the baser elements of amusement together with much that is morally questionable. But, thanks to a few timely fires and the incoming of the amusement capitalist with better ideas of the true carnival spirit; both a purging of the old and the re-establishing of a newer and higher order of things have made the Island not only tolerable but attractive. When one remembers how under the old regime of frauds and fakirs it was possible for anyone with a few dollars and a lot of "cheek," a voluble lying "barker" and a "made-up exhibit" to establish a show; one cannot but feel glad that the day has come when it takes dollars by the tens of thousands and an exhibition of the highest class to secure a place and a performance at once both legitimate and attractive; one realizes this transforming of old Coney as being such that one need no longer be ashamed to be seen there.

In this progressive growth the moving picture has of course found a place; but, while it has found a place, it has by no means found its right place, as nowhere is it to be seen occupying the high place it really ought to fill in the City of Fun.

It is both surprising and regretable that those controlling the large attractions have not given greater prominence to the amusement possibilities of motion pictures. In one of these there is an exhibition (without charge) which is commendable and which might be enlarged upon and given greater prominence with much advantage. An open-air theater in any of the large spaces occupied by the several leading amusement corporations would be more attractive than an occasional old-fashioned circus performance and no doubt have a beneficial effect upon the "gate." Neither is there a moving picture theater worth the name in the City of Fun, where there is every opportunity for a first-class, high-class, worthy exhibit; indeed, it is surprising that none of the moving picture people have seized the opportunity of making a name with an exhibition in a place where something first-class would be a worldwide advertisement. In the presence of these statements the reader will ask: Where are the moving pictures at Coney Island? The answer is, almost everywhere, on the streets in wrong places, doing an ignoble if not an obnoxious work. Every common and every low and vulgar drinking place has its exhibition—the better class places do not use them in this way—alluring people to enter for drinking purposes. "Seats free, seats all free inside," is the constant yell of the hoarse-voiced, bleered-eyed, sodden-looking, ill-clad, common Coney Island "barker" of the worst days—a person repugnant and repellant to every respectable individual; that "barker" who as a type of the past makes everyone glad that the old days are gone and sorry that he, too, has not sunk into the oblivion he deserves and to which he belongs. But miserable misfortune he survives, and that to be at once a suave inducer to "enter," or a ruffian to "clear the sidewalk" should any pause for a moment and not accept his dictum to "enter, please; seats free."

Suppose you enter, are the seats free? No sooner are you seated than you become the prey of vulture-speed waiters with "your order, please," and drink you must, the length of your stay inside depending in the first place upon the length of time you take to empty your glass; for as soon as the glass is empty it is instantly removed and another waiter demands "your order, please," and continue drinking you must at this "free show." For the wary ones who take time emptying their glasses a tip is given to the operator, who announces on the screen an "intermission," when all are—against the law—under pressure gradually expelled, the screens at the door withdrawn to show the empty seats and the heavy-lunged "barker" begins to bray his "next exhibition about to commence," "seats free," etc., etc., and the bibulous performance goes on again.

This is the degraded work the moving pictures are made to do in the City of Fun, making every true lover of moving pictures desire to go in and clean house, smash the poor machines, destroy the "junk" pictures, send the "barker" to the "stonepile," where he might do a bit of honest work; thereby restoring the moving picture business to the place it belongs; rescuing it from the nefarious business of alluring to drink for the benefit of low-living, unhealthy, beer gardens of the worst type.

Refreshing as an oasis in the desert was it when in Steeplechase Park and in Dreamland were found a good, clean class of pictures, with pleasant surroundings, no "barker," no waiters, no trap of any kind; here was the right place for the moving pictures; would that others might follow this example and make the exhibition of amusing and entertaining pictures one of the best attractions in Coney Island. There can be no doubt but that the change will come; the natural demand for the best of everything will continue until the worst is entirely eradicated.

Why not a moving picture palace? The living pictures have as good claims as any, and more than many of the attractions of to-day; a City of Fun is now not complete without the art of the moving pictures. When this laudable desire shall have been fulfilled we shall see the end of the misuse of the pictures as an allurement to drinking halls in the hands of the unscrupulous. So among the highest class entertainments advertised will be those given in the moving picture palace on a large scale nowhere excelled outside the City of Fun.

Why Vaudeville Was Called Upon.

By C. W. Lawford.

When moving pictures first became popular it was a common thing to hear one party saying to another, "let's go down to the moving pictures" or, if a stranger in town, they might ask a passer by where the "picture show" was located, in fact, every reference to the small-priced, or store show either commenced or ended with the word "moving picture" or "picture," for brevity. Within the past two years things have changed and some things have changed very rapidly, too, until to-day you hear much less of the "picture show" and the references are usually "pictures and vaudeville," "vaudeville show." Many will ask, "How were the acts?" "Was the vaudeville any good?" and then, lastly, they will ask, "How were the pictures?"

I do not mean to imply that all moving picture theaters have vaudeville, far from it. There are still a great many houses running straight pictures and making some money, too. What I do mean to imply is that something was found wanting—and vaudeville was called upon.

What was found wanting? and why was it found wanting? To answer these questions intelligently, and to appreciate the full meaning and value of such answers requires a deal of study and observation in the gentle art of human nature both by the writer and his many readers. Speaking for the writer; eighteen years of experience before, and dealing with, that most fickle animal "the public," I, unegotistically, assume the responsibility for the answers, while you, as the reader, must exercise what intelligence God has seen fit to give you, together with your own knowledge acquired.

The public, particularly the theatergoing public, of to-day, as well as in the past, is a mass and conglomeration of many minds, many ideas, many tastes and many whims. They easily tire of sameness, of stereotyped ways, abhorring ancient customs and continually demanding modernity and progress. They want variety, something new and, above all, something different, and while some portions or classes will be satisfied with cheap and inferior conditions, for a time, yet this class may be rated as in their own world of ignorance from which they sooner or later ascend to nobler heights, and higher ambitions and aspirations, both in mind, body and soul, and when they do arise to these heights, and their intelligence broadens, this world of progress usually seems to travel too slow to keep them from degenerating again. You may think I am deviating from my text, but if you are up in the study of human nature and you have followed the progress of the moving picture to date, you will at once awake to the point in hand, which is something is indeed "found wanting," and this something is improvement, and the handwriting on the wall warns us that novelty and variety are also "found wanting." As an amusement attraction and theatrical faction, the moving picture has been nothing but a reflection on a curtain, true coloring has been added, flicker eliminated and general projection is down to a more scientific basis; but still the one point in evidence is "the picture is nothing more than a reflection on the curtain," a mere pantomime or automation. It lacks the natural touches, the voices and the many other realistic effects contained in the human drama before the footlights and in everyday life. Phonographs have been utilized to add nature to the picture, and the general results have been failures and the moving picture stands still to-day with a greater leaning toward the ebb than any other way. The engagement of noted actors and actresses is not what is needed nor the production of eminent plays, nor the natural coloring, it is nature, the human touch, the realistic effect and novelty that will be necessary to hold and grip the audience and the lack of this, together with the desire of many managers, of placing their theaters and entertainments above the sentiment of commonness that has been attached to the 5c theater, are the principal reasons "why vaudeville was called upon," and while in a great many instances the selection of this vaudeville was in very bad taste and even worse judgment, it, to say the least, embodied life, natural action and, above all, novelty and variety, while the poor picture continued to remain "a mere reflection on a curtain."

If you are, by chance, led to assume, through reading the foregoing, that I am in any way antagonistic to or set against the progress of motion pictures, you are very much mistaken, as anyone will inform you who is acquainted with my past efforts. My only desire is to bring before those interested the plain unvarnished facts, and bring you all to realize where you stand and where you will stand and what you will stand and what you will be up against in the future, from an amusement point of view, unless some ingenious minds and harmonious business heads get busy very soon.

The moving picture should, and I hope will, be in the near future, a strong enough attraction in itself to fill any reasonably large theater and furnish ample entertainment for the most skeptical, illiterate or educated person, old or young, and without the aid of stimulants from other branches of the show business, and the sooner this can be brought to pass, and the admission price raised, the sooner the exhibitor will be able to save a dollar instead of having to give it all to the performers, film exchanges, and license commissioners.

WHO FILMED THE MODERN WOODMEN OF AMERICA?

We are told that some time about June, 1908, the Modern Woodmen of America held a Supreme Lodge Encampment, or "Head Camp," as they call it, in Peoria, Ill. Some moving picture man at that time took pictures of the parade and encampment and we have an inquiry from an exhibitor for this reel or set of reels. Any information that will locate them will be appreciated by the Moving Picture World.

NEW INDEPENDENT FILM MANUFACTURER.

The following announcement is clipped from a St. Louis paper bearing date of August 16:

"The best scenes from Mark Twain, including the whitewash episode in 'Tom Sawyer,' Mississippi River pictures from 'Huckleberry Finn' and the thumb print story of 'Pudd'n Head Wilson,' will be produced in moving pictures in a St. Louis factory this Fall. A company is being organized by Joseph Roach, at present assistant manager of the William H. Swanson Film Exchange. The company will have a capital of $20,000 or more. Its plant will be located in the country.

"Roach says that there is a dearth of American comedy among the independent producers. He believes that a plant in St. Louis will have an excellent opportunity of disposing of good comic films as well as the serious drama. Eleven embryo dramas have been arranged by him for production in the new plant. Another film he expects to make will tell the story of 'The Legend of Sleepy Hollow,' the romance of Ichabod Crane and Katrina Van Tassel, written by Washington Irving."

TO THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

It is with great pleasure that I read in your current issue the comments of the "Man-About-Town" and the "Censorship of Newspapers." Never in the history of American journalism was there more need for newspaper censorship than to-day. We must expect to hear a great "howl" at this proposal invading the much vaunted "freedom of the press," but even newspapers must learn that the God-given blessing of freedom can be abused. There is no treason more rank than that which abuses the highest beneficent privileges it is possible for the human family to enjoy. Moving picture people everywhere are to be congratulated upon the higher standards which are constantly being reached in moving picture work. The vaudeville has been shamed, and now the newspapers must take lessons from the hitherto much maligned moving picture. It is true that there was a time when criticisms were justifiable, but the moving picture people had the good sense to impose conditions from within and of themselves, "cleaned house" without the intervention of authorities. The newspapers could wisely profit by this example, for if they do not it may be necessary for the sake of public decency and official safety to force upon them a censorship which shall make morals clean and life safe. One New York paper especially, both by word and picture, deserves the greatest possible censure. A series of imaginary murder pictures seem one of its special features, illustrating successive incidents in crime even to the extent of portraying villainy not proved to have taken place; indeed, viler illustrations cannot be conceived. No moving pictures ever were guilty of such conceptions. The hypocritical ravings of its writings, too, are such as arouse the loathing of discriminating souls. Feeding the pangs of discontent with raillery of those in official life, is it any wonder that poor misguided minds are wrought upon to do evil? Pilate may wash his hands in public, but he will ever be both loathed for his cowardice and blamed for the crucifixion of the innocent.

It is further to the credit of the moving picture fraternity that instead of rebelling at censorship they rather sought it; with what satisfaction now can they direct critics to the Board of Censors, and claim a legitimate immunity from criticism; not from blame, for all cause of blame is now removed and their outlook was never better than to-day. Trusting their growth in quality will bring with it attendant prosperity and if the newspapers are content to grovel in scavenger work let the moving picture become more and more ennobled.

A READER.

EXCLUDE THE CRIMINAL; OR SOME FURTHER LIMITATIONS OF THE PICTURE.

Time and experience are the best teachers and good heed given to their suggestions is wise. Everyone who comes before the public in any way whatever seeks to know the public mind and endeavors by right interpretation to be guided thereby.

One of the latest incidents calling attention at the present time is the ill-advised use by morbid people of the suicidal extremes they see in moving pictures.

It will not fulfill any purpose here to mention any of these instances; suffice it to say that in each case there was evidently a developed insanity which only needed a weird suggestion to bring about a climax. These final suggestions often come through reading of crimes in newspapers (but the newspapers are not blamed) or in some theater performance; but if it perchance comes from a moving picture exhibition the hypercritical howl, although the blame is undeserved. The writer has often wondered why we all of us never saw any wrong in the children's "Punch and Judy," which is really a brutal thing and ends with a hanging. Perhaps it is the view point, children are not morbid and "it's all done in fun;" a similar breadth of interpretation is not possible where people are older, unreasonable, morbid and critical. However, is there no profit to be gained from these experiences? Would it not be better to exclude from all pictures actual and positive criminal acts, even as actual immoral acts are excluded. A battle or similar fight is very different to a murder, or an accident to a suicide; there is also a difference between the tragical and the tragedy. The law as applied to the actual may serve as a guide to the pictured as suggested above; and while many motion picture makers and exhibitors may not see the real necessity of adopting this suggestion, to do so will be dignified and ennobling, besides taking away from the supercillious the occasion to use their arrogant criticisms At any rate it is worth while considering whether or not these actual criminal acts should not be tempered in tone to meet the kindlier instincts of the human family.

MEDICAL KINEMATOGRAPHY—A GREAT DISCOVERY.

Probably the greatest value of the moving picture development both to science and the human family is the combined use of the kinematograph and the Rontgen tube or X-rays. It has been proved by the use of these combined instruments that the working of the functions of the human system may not only be studied but by reproduction open up a new field both for study and teaching. A medical scientist writes: In the kinematographic image of respiration we behold how the lungs are filled and the spaces between the ribs increased. Our astonished gaze follows the course of food from the stomach into the intestines and its further rhythmic progress. That these possibilities are not only of great didactic value, but yield important disclosures to the medical investigator concerning the normal and morbid processes, needs no elucidation.

But what until recently remained impossible was a sharp delineation of the processes of the heart; the attendant difficulties have, however, been overcome in a remarkable and successful manner.

P. H. Eijkman, a Dutch investigator, was the first to discover a way to solve the difficulty. A single but most powerful electrical discharge is made through the Rontgen tube, for which purpose it was necessary to devise an entirely new apparatus. With this apparatus, Eijkman made kinematographic pictures of the heart lately presented, for the first time, at the congress of German scientists and physicians at Salzburg.

In his method of heart kinematography an apparatus is employed which, placed upon an artery, follows and records exactly the motions of the pulse and, therefore, of the heart. Now this sphygmograph, as it is termed, is connected with a sensitive electrical apparatus, which, readily placed at a precisely determined point, conducts the electrical discharge through the Rontgen tubes, thereby producing its momentary flash. The person experimented on is comfortably placed and his pulse is watched during the entire time.

It is thus possible, this German writer maintains, to see the human heart-beat on the kinematograph screen. Every individual position of its various chambers, in every phase of motion, may be noted upon it

It is with pleasure that we can record this great advance in medical kinematography in these pages, believing that this is but another step in the direction of that great value to which the cinematograph is working.

"THEATER VOYONS," LOWELL, MASS.

Being a Truthful Account of an Experience of a Boston Lady Who Has Contracted the Picture Habit.

One sultry afternoon, strolling down the main street of Lowell, my boots sinking into the melting asphalt, I chanced to look up and read "Theater Voyons," the French for "Let us see." The odd name attracted me. I promptly paid my dime and entered—Paradise, as I thought, after the burning furnace outside. If you can imagine a perfectly ventilated, clear, cool, simple but tasty little hall of leather covered comfortable seats you have a faint idea of the little gem of a theater my good luck led me into. Fairly exhausted from my delightful but long trolley ride from Boston and my landing into a hot, sizzling, butling square, homeless as a gypsy, I experienced one of the most delicious sensations of rest I will remember for a long time. I sank into my chair with a "homey" feeling of repose, shared I am sure by the few scattered around me at the napping hour of a midsummer's day. Closing my eyes I forgot for a few brief moments the whole world and its cares until a lively tune played briskly on the piano, out of sight before the stage, aroused me to the fact that the show was going to commence. The pianist proved to be one of the versatile kind who can produce most anything from rag-time to a rhapsody—a genius of his kind that must be heard to be appreciated. To his music lovely views unrolled slowly—the refreshing sights of Swiss mountains and their everlasting snows, revealing to us the whole process of preparing the condense milk of the world at large. Next a tale in pictures began to unfold and fascinate you by its appealing love story; followed by a most unique production of "A Study in Flowers." Hortensias, lilies, roses and more fine specimens in quaint vases or free, danced in most dainty time, showing off their delicate shape, greatly enlarged in such a way as to prove a most interesting study for the botanist.

A performer announced outside in big lettering came quietly forward at the front side of the stage to deliver an impromptu lecture on the picture depicting the gloomy story of the weals and woes of Mazeppa of Tartary in the land of the Czar. The lecturer, Herbert Le Roy, proved to be a most gifted speaker with a big sonorous voice, who by deft touches here and there gave a concise idea of the cruelty perpetrated even to this day in the land of the almighty Czar of all the Russias. The picture story ending in a happy tale of love, gave him an opportunity to disperse most cleverly, by a delicate and refined style of story telling, the heavy gloom that had cast its darkest shadows on the audience who had by this time crowded in, filling every kink and corner of the pretty little theater. As the last word of his resonant voice died away rousing applause greeted him. Next a comical picture sketch started old and young roaring—the mishaps of a would-be paper hanger, ending by the engagement of a "regular" to finish the job. A lovely set of colored pictures, accompanied by a singer appearing where the lecturer had stood, brought on a resting mood and keen enjoyment of the glorious voice which more than filled the little auditorium with its rich, full tones. An encore demanded and graciously granted brought another verse of the sweet ballad. Another love story fascinated us by its breezy action, followed by a fine barytone who gave a splendid finish to one of the most agreeable afternoons I ever spent in a moving picture show. Last but not least a word of thanks must be tendered to the manager of the "Theater Voyons" who showed such fine judgment in giving his patrons such a wholesome variety of mirth, sorrow, fun and educational matter on one of the most trying afternoons of a hot midsummer day in dusty Lowell, Mass.

MOTION PICTURES ARE A POWER FOR GOOD.

[From the "Boston Transcript."]

A staff writer of the Congregationalist, in a current number of that publication, presents "The Case of Motion Pictures" in the first of two papers on the subject. Perhaps none of Edison's inventions has had larger possibilities with respect to its influence upon the popular mind than this. It has developed so rapidly within the last few years that the public has hardly realized the extent to which it now enters into the entertainment and education of every large community. That it may have evil effects if unrestricted is only saying what is true of almost every new thing that in its legitimate application has proved a blessing to mankind. Mr. Edison himself believes it to be a potential force for human betterment, and such it undoubtedly can and should be made. He says: "I believe that the motion picture presents a ready means in the hands of the broad-minded, intelligent and informed workers for the world's good, for the innocent amusement, efficient instruction and moral advance of the great masses of people."

Nothing has ever before done so much to bring the world to our very doors as this invention. What is more to the point, we can view the world in action. Even if it is only a quiet pastoral scene, we can see the grass waving, the flowers nodding, the aspens trembling and the birds flitting through the trees. We can see history in the making, great orators swaying their audiences. What an impressive spectacle it would be had the scene of the signing of the Declaration of Independence been preserved for all time in the moving picture; and when in time that and the phonograph can be made to harmoniously co-operate, as they ultimately will, the real presence of the great singers and the composers can be brought before us, no matter how long after they have passed away.

"Within almost a single round of seasons," says the writer in the Congregationalist, "the picture show has become an immense enterprise, a world-wide amusement, a universal influence. . . . It has forged ahead into international popularity, and in this country alone probably two and a quarter millions of people visit these shows daily." A staff writer in the Survey says: "On an island 2,000 miles out in the Pacific Ocean the exiled lepers of Molokai gather daily before the flickering wonders of a screen that shows them the world of life and freedom." What a boon for the unfortunate!

Again quoting the writer: "while no one can be blind to the fact of its great possibilities for evil, as well as for good, the moving picture has neither done so much harm nor deserved such imprecations as have been put upon it by well-meaning but uninformed Christian people. The church, particularly, cannot afford to adopt toward it that prejudicial attitude so often maintained toward the theater in general." The elimination of the evils belongs to public sentiment expressed through legislation. We have had bad books and bad pictures, but they are proportionately growing fewer under the representative force of a more sensitive public conscience. The imagination can hardly compass the good that may be accomplished in a thousand ways by means of what is destined to be a universal educator.

WANTED: A NAME.

Please give me a name!
Not that I'm short, for I've now got too many
Which is a great deal worse than not having any

I'm the strangest of creatures, as every one says
'Till it's hard to know where I came from,
With so many fathers and so many mothers
And, having no sisters, and being without brothers
They've given me all the names they could think of
So now we are all in a terrible muddle.

Some call me a picture, some say I'm a scene
Many say I'm all right in a too "slightly wrong"
I'm Latin'd and Greek'd,
I'm French'd, English'd and Yank'd,
The givers of some names ought to be spanked!

I can teach and instruct, I'm both patron and freak,
And, what is most wonderful, I'm best in the dark.
I make people laugh, I make people cry,
I make some of them live, I make some of them die

I've traveled the world over and wherever I go
People all pay me money, some call me "a show,"
Others, with more dignity, disdain to decide
And, with genuine flattery, add to my pride

But I must now settle down, and be known everywhere,
And with but one name my nature declare
So won't you please help, and Papa Essanay
Has fully declared, "One hundred dollars he'll pay"
To whoever decides on a name good and true,
So that all may know me, and then I'll know you!

EXHIBITORS CO-OPERATING IN ESSANAY CONTEST.

New Name Contest Will Close Next Week.

Hundreds of exhibitors all over the country have evinced interest in the Essanay Company's contest and are playing it up with their patrons. Through the medium of their local papers, poster advertising, etc., they are telling their citizens about the $100 offered by the Essanay Company for a single one-word name and many are offering a special prize if the contest is won by one of their own citizens.

The many letters received by the Essanay Company from exhibitors in all States shows that the contest has aroused widespread interest. A letter from Haring & Blumenthal, of Jersey City, N. J., shows one plan of the exhibitors to reap advertising benefits through the contest. This letter reads:

Essanay Film Manufacturing Company,
Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:—Noting that in your Guide you make an offer of $100 for a word, we are using the same in the following manner.

We are proprietors of three moving picture houses and at each we intend to place upon the screen an offer of $100 to be awarded by us and you to be the judge of the winner of the contest. We will install in the lobbies circulars setting forth the same terms of the contest as you use.

Knowing that there are large advertising possibilities in such a contest and also knowing you to have the interest of the exhibitor at heart, we trust that this proposition will meet with your approval.

Yours very respectfully,
HARING & BLUMENTHAL.

As the contest draws to a close the Essanay Company is desirous of obtaining as many contributions as possible and extends an invitation to all exhibitors to co-operate with them in obtaining the appropriate name. Among the many suggestions they offer exhibitors the following press notice, if given space in the exhibitor's local papers, will undoubtedly attract attention and interest. It is undoubtedly a good advertising proposition for all picture theaters and should be used.

PICTURE THEATER HAS NOVEL CONTEST
One Hundred Dollars Offered for New Name

Manager ..... of the ..... Theater has announced a novel contest to be conducted by his theater in cooperation with the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, of Chicago, for a new name for "moving picture show," and offers a prize of $100 to the winner. "Moving picture show," "Nickelodeon," "Five Cent Theater" and other names used to describe these entertainments, it is claimed by the picture people, are antedate and do not do the beautiful entertainment justice in the way of nomenclature.

The contest, which was suggested by the Essanay Company, has attracted the interest and attention of picture theater patrons all over the country, but Manager ..... is making special endeavor that the prize may be won by a ..... citizen. As a further inducement he has offered another prize of the same kind of this city.

"Our announcement of the contest has already aroused considerable interest," said Mr. ..... "and many of our citizens have contributed to the Essanay Company's Contest Editor. What is wanted is a suitable name short enough to be easily remembered, easy to spell and yet convey properly the idea of 'Moving Picture Show.' The name should be appropriate and suggest the real dignity and high quality of the entertainment offered by the motion picture houses.

"The last few years has seen enormous strides in the moving picture field, and millions of dollars are spent each year by the manufacturers of films in producing thoroughly artistic subjects. At first tolerated as a fad that would soon pass away, the motion picture has firmly established itself as an important factor not only in the amusement field but in the educational as well. The motion picture theater offers an inexpensive entertainment, but not a 'cheap' one. It has undoubtedly come to stay."

The terms of the contest conducted by the ..... Theater, in co-operation with the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company are given below.

One hundred dollars is offered for a new name for "moving picture show," which will be used as a new name for the ..... Theater and for shows of that kind all over the country.

The contest is open to anyone anywhere, to send any number of names, and the first one sending the winning name will surely get the $100. The name will possibly be used all over the country, but the shows at this city will be the first to adopt it.

The word should be typewritten or written plainly in ink on the face of an envelope, while the address of the contributor of the word should be written on a separate slip and sealed within the envelope.

As the envelopes are received, they will be time-stamped, so that in case there is more than one contribution of the prize-winning word the envelope which is received first at the office, address below, will contain the name of the winner of the $100.

The judges will be appointed and the contest handled by the Essanay Company, of Chicago.

The contest closes September 1, and the winner will be announced as soon as possible thereafter.

All contributions must be sent by the contestants to the Contest Editor, Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, 435 North Clark street, Chicago, Ill.

THE WORKINGMAN'S COLLEGE.

By Jane Elliott Snow.

"What is the workingman's college?"

Why, the moving picture show.

"How can that be?"

Let us see.

In the first place it is the workingman's college because he can thereby acquire a broad and liberal education.

"A liberal education from that nonsense!" I hear some one say.

But the moving pictures are not wholly made up of nonsense; far from it. There is some to be sure, but

"A little nonsense now and then
Is relished by the best of men."

Besides it is good for one. Cold indeed must be the heart of the man who doesn't respond to a bit of humor, at least at times. Life is quite too serious for one to wholly ignore its funny side.

"Laugh, and the world laughs with you;
Weep, and you weep alone."

One of the best known and best loved men of all time was Mark Twain, whose humor has kept the world in smiles for many years and will continue to keep it smiling while our literature endures.

Even the great Dr. Lyman Beecher saw the necessity of humor. His daughter tells us that when the distinguished divine was preparing one of his soul-stirring sermons he devoted all his energies to it; he thought of nothing but his sermon until he had delivered it. Then he went home, brought out his violin, and drew forth from its well toned chords some lively music, which helped to relax the strain to which his nerves had been so long subjected.

The daughter speaks of this last proceeding as her father's method of "letting himself down." While his preparation for the final delivery of his sermon was the act of "winding himself up."

The budget of Lincoln stories bids fair never to become exhausted, which proves that our immortal War President was endowed with a greater sense of humor than that possessed by the ordinary man. This gift no doubt helped to lighten the enormous burden of responsibility and care, which the exigencies of the times imposed upon him.

So much for the funny, the humorous side of the moving picture show. As to the objection sometimes raised that they (the shows) are harmful, they cannot be, since the National Board of Censors have placed their ban upon everything of that character. Some of the film producers are now particular to inform the writers of their scenarios that no scenes of crime, or violence, or anything suggestive of immorality will be permitted.

The workingman, while he is acquiring his higher education at the moving picture show, needs the amusing features of it to relax his wearied muscles after his day of toil in the shop or factory.

As he enters the theater he sees thrown upon the canvas possibly a scene where people get into all sorts of amusing situations, they run, fall down, tumble over each other, fall into holes, into water, scramble out and create such hearty laughter that the workman forgets his weariness and is prepared to fully enjoy and appreciate the graver, or the more educational subjects which follow.

He visits different countries; he sees the Fetish worshippers in "Darkest Africa." He sees the Hindoo prostrating himself before his gods; the muezzin calling the faithful to prayer; he sees the Chinaman with his queue and the Turk in his flowing robes. He realizes as never before that this is a great world, and that people of varied ideas, customs and manners inhabit it.

He witnesses the process of some new industry—new to him at least—and then changes off to literature, or possibly to a story taken from Greek mythology.

His mind may be narrow, cramped, but in spite of all he is gaining ideas; his views of life are broadening, and ere long he will become a pretty well educated man.

Indeed it is questionable if since time began there was ever a simple instrumentality that would compare with the moving picture in its work of educating the masses.

I say masses, because the masses are in attendance at the moving picture show, and the masses represent those who toil with their hands.

The workingman cannot attend the professional ball games because it takes half a dollar just to get into the grounds, and in addition it requires the loss of half a day's time. He cannot attend the high class concerts because neither his purse nor his time will admit of it, nor, for the same reasons, can he travel to any great extent, but he can visit the moving picture shows, and there he can travel through all lands and learn the condition of people in all climes.

Who then can say that the moving picture show is not the workingman's college? The medium through which he may rise to the rank of a broad-minded, well-educated man.

FREE MOVING PICTURE ENTERTAINMENTS PROPOSED FOR MILWAUKEE SCHOOLS.

The Milwaukee "Journal" has offered to the school board of that city to provide free of all expense ten moving picture entertainments in as many schools. Commenting on the "Journal's" offer the Rev. R. R. McKaig (M. E.) says:

"I am so much in favor of that sort of thing that I would give the free use of a room in our big gymnasium to have them given here for the benefit of the factory boys and girls and others. I wish it might be arranged to have them presented here. It is an intelligent substitute for something that has come to stay, for moving picture shows are now firmly established here and elsewhere. The 'Journal's' idea is a fine one and it ought to result in much good. I for one shall do all I can to help the move along."

MOVING PICTURES IN SCHOOLS TO TEACH.

[Editorial in Birmingham, Ala., "Ledger."]

The moving picture is possibly the most useful, if well managed, of all the modern improvements. The possibilities are illimitable for instruction as well as for amusement.

By many teachers it is held that students learn by the eye more quickly and retain the learning better than they do by ear. It is certain that we all do learn more easily when we see and hear the lesson. A good lecturer with a moving picture, giving the scenes in all the perfection of the art, could teach as no other lecturer or instructor could.

During all the years of the schools there have been some teachers standing out as the most successful, because they could impart knowledge and guide investigation better than others. With this instrument any intelligent teacher is able to impart information in a way acceptable to any child mind, and make indelible impressions. Not only can that be done, but it is not necessary that the teacher should have spent years in studying or in travel. Well-prepared films and a careful study of them gives the lecturer all knowledge the average person needs to instruct classes. It is right in line with the psychology of a child's mind to see what the teacher is talking about, and particularly is this true of geography and travel. Actual scenes are given from the lands in question, from the cities under study. In literature the pictures of the writer and scenes of his home and pictures of his books make a wonderful lesson.

Mathematics can be taught by the pictures with all the entertainment possible to throw into it. The demonstrations are better than those on the blackboard. Many of the studies can be given quickly and thoroughly with the pictures. The idea can be developed indefinitely. Already the pictures show the beaten roads of travel and many scenes that grown people like to see.

With a set of films prepared for the schools it is easy to see how much more pleasant several of the studies can be made. For instance, take the rubber industry, and the picture can show the trees in the forest, the laborers gathering and preparing the crude gum, the factory where it is made and the various forms of the finished rubber in use. There is an unlimited field for the right teachers with the right films. How quickly that combination could build the right education.

August and December are two months of the calendar year that present more paradoxical features than any of the other months. December is the great month of joys and sorrows. The two extremes are closely associated and quite noticeably mingled. August, to the moving picture man, is much the same. Many say that from the start to the ending of Summer the moving picture man's lot is a sad one. But such is not the case. At least he does not show it is such, so far as my observations have extended, and I can assure you they have been much more than casual. As the opening of Summer approaches he says, quite philosophically, the time will soon be at hand when he must either close up for a month or two or reduce the class of his service to a minimum. Summer arrives and in the same spirit he says to his exchange, "Can that first run of mine and give me the cheapest you've got. I'm going to keep even with expenses until the Summer closes." He continues in this frame of mind until about the first of August, when a change comes over him and he asks if the Summer will ever run out. This unrest grows for the next week or two and he tells his friends he never experienced a worse season. It seems to take him until the middle of August to discover that he has been trying to keep his head above expenses. He becomes peevish and at times morose, sometimes despondent; he becomes deeply imbued with the idea that the moving pictures are going to the dogs, that they have lost their drawing power and all that sort of thing. In this frame of mind he drags along until the opening of the third week of August. Then a new spirit moves him. He realizes that the Fall season is approaching and, instead of bequeathing his show place to somebody and committing suicide, he hastens to his film exchange and opens negotiations for a high grade service and a high class reopening.

So it is at the present time. I have heard an awful amount of grumbling by exhibitors during the past two months over the conditions of the picture business and it was hard for me to fight off the belief that many of them would quit the field before the Fall; but, as in previous years, I find all of them figuring on what it will cost to enlarge, improve or renovate their places and provide attractions superior to their offerings of the past. There are no quitters among them. The only men on the list of quitters are those who stopped before the Summer season started. Those who have held on to their places are full of hope and look for a good Fall and Winter season. Joyful anticipations, as it were, follow the sorrowful experiences that surrounded the box office when it is too warm for the people to walk up to it.

And the reason some people give for weathering the adverse conditions and sticking to their places are amusing at times. I know many people who gave up mercantile pursuits to open picture shows who have told me that they like to run them even at a loss because there is a fascination in the business. Others say they run them to give their children jobs in the box office, at the piano or somewhere else. Others claim bad credits make the mercantile business too hazardous and the loss in the picture business is much smaller because it is a cash in advance proposition. Few will admit that any profit is made and those who concede there is a profit put it always at a minimum. But all of them manage to pull through for the Fall opening.

Referring to the profit and loss side of the exhibiting business, has it ever struck you that it is extremely rare that you see a receiver take hold of any of the places? Now I do not pretend to advance the theory that exhibitors do not fail. I do contend, however, that there is no other business in which there are less receiverships. I think the picture business holds the record for this. Of course I concede that a receiver would go hungry in almost any of them. When the crash comes the unsuccessful manager turns the key in the door and walks away, and that is the end of the story. Aside from the projecting machine (when not rented) and the chairs in the place (when not covered by a chattel mortgage) there is nothing a receiver could take and the manager can walk away confident that he has left nothing behind upon which his creditors could realize any more than he could.

This is just the situation that was referred to by an exchange man the other day. He declared it is the hardest thing to convince some exhibitors that he is justified in asking payment in advance for the rental service. When this proposition is made it is met with an intensified display of indignation that any suspicion should be entertained about the exhibitor's integrity and honesty. No protestations will avail. The exhibitor will not take the view that it is a business proposition tending to secure the exchange against some event, either foreseen or unforeseen.

"Why am I not justified in asking payment in advance?" asked the exchange man. "The exhibitor gets his money before the people see the show." An exhibitor who overheard the remark delivered this argument in reply: "You are not compelled, nor do you, pay the manufacturers for the films until after you have received them and have rented them. We put up our money to buy or lease land and buildings, and invest large amounts in fitting up a place. When we do this our credit should be good for at least one week." "That is very true, so far as it goes," argued the exchange man, "but when you have run an exchange and met some of the people I have come in contact with you will see that I know what I am talking about. My experience has been this: By starting out on the credit system I weaken my position and when the exhibitor comes to me with a hard luck story I cannot call his attention to my inflexible rule to require payment in advance. If he runs up a bill on me and I threaten to cut off his service I hurt his feelings and he secures films elsewhere." Once more the exhibitor spoke: "I know such cases have happened and it is too bad that they should occur because incidents of that character are as hurtful in a measure to the honest exhibitor as they are unfair to the film exchanges, but I want to say right here that many exchanges have justified the refusal to pay in advance by not giving to the exhibitors the films agreed upon after advance payment had been made."

"All that will be regulated in time," said a fourth party, who had stepped up unobserved. He was a man who is pretty well posted in all branches of the picture business. When asked how it would be done, he said he did not know exactly, but he had a well founded belief that the General Films Company, that is gradually gathering in the licensed exchanges, would be one of the mediums through which the regulation would be effected. One of the listeners remarked that talk about that company had pretty well died out and he had not heard recently of its activity. The man of information replied: "I went to my exchange the other day and found quite a change. The routine was going on as usual, but the man who had owned the place was only the manager. It seemed to me that the change was made as quickly and quietly as the turning of a pancake on a griddle. Those people certainly have the dope. Last Spring there were nine licensed exchanges in Greater New York. How many do you think there are now? Practically three. There are really still six distributing points for licensed films, but only three owners. Two exchanges passed out of the licensed fold last Spring. Five of the remaining exchanges are branches of the General Films Company. Two exchanges are still doing business under their original names."

The party was correct. Five of the remaining licensed exchanges in Greater New York are now controlled by the General Films Company. The last to be acquired was one of the pioneers in the rental business, the American Vitagraph Company. If I am not mistaken that company and the P. O. Waters exchange were the pioneers. These were in the business long before the Nickelodeon era started. Of the five exchanges the American Vitagraph Exchange is the only one to lose its identity altogether. The other four are still doing business at their own stands and the former owners are running them. The American Vitagraph Exchange business has been transferred to the quarters of the old Kleine Exchange and Mr. Willis, who has so long been identified with the latter, is now running both. The last purchase was not a surprise to those in touch with the rental business. Negotiations to that end had been pending for some time. It was generally believed that when the deal would be effected the exchange would remain at the old quarters, as it was the only licensed exchange south of Fourteenth street and close to the Brooklyn Bridge and the several downtown ferries. It seems the fire that occurred in the quarters of that exchange about two months ago changed the plans as to the continuance of location.

And with this change "Pop" Rock, one of the war horses of the picture business, retires from the rental field. I understand it was quite a sentimental departure on his part as the exchange had a warm spot in his heart. I was about to say he had also retired from the exhibition field. This would not be correct. "Pop" Rock and Tom O'Day, of San Francisco, are the managers of the J. & J. Company that controls the Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures, so the man with the expansive and brilliant chest is still in harness. With apologies to a song writer of the times we may all sing: "We still have our big diamond Bill."

THE ALIEN OPERATOR IN NEW YORK.

There are two kinds of kicks in this world, the polite kick and the nasty kick. The fellow who makes the nasty kick nearly always defeats his purpose, but there is something about the man who makes a polite kick that gains him a hearing where the other one fails. There walked into our office a day or so ago a mild-mannered young German, who asked us in a very quiet way if we knew of someone who needed an operator. We asked him the usual reference, in answer to which he produced documents that brought to our attention a condition of which we are bound to take notice. But the thing that impressed us most about this man was the note of quiet patience in his voice and manner. He made no wild-eyed protest or threats of shooting any public official. In fact, whatever information he gave us came in the form of answers to questions we put to him, and it is probable that we would have known nothing of his trouble if we had not dragged it out of him. He was so decent and uncomplaining in the face of ridiculous and unjust conditions that he appealed to us, and we think that the facts in this case are worthy of some attention as an illustration of pernicious law making.

The letter from the Department of Gas and Electricity, which we print below, explains with brutal brevity just why Mr. Freese is now walking the streets looking for a job. But it doesn't suggest in the least what is to become of a wife and six little American-born children depending upon him. The letter:

Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity,
City of New York.
Harry S. Thompson, Commissioner.
13-21 Park Row, August 12, 1910.

Mr. Frederick F. Freese,
320 East 125th street,
New York City.

Dear Sir—Answering your question, I beg to advise you that while you recently passed successfully our examination, the department is debarred from issuing to you a moving picture operator's license card, owing to the fact that you are not a citizen of the United States. Very truly,

H. S. WYNKOOP,
Electrical Engineer.

Assistant to Chief Engineer of Light and power.

Reader, if you had served this country of ours in time of war, and had spent ten months in that malaria swamp known as Chickamauga Park, as Mr. Freese did, and then received this letter in thanks for it, we know how much love you would have for Old Glory, so we will not ask you. While Uncle Sam may have no direct knowledge of this case, it seems that when men are needed to fight for the Stars and Stripes they are enlisted quickly and no questions asked about whether or not they are citizens of the United States. But let the foreign recruit try to become a citizen and he finds the Government very particular indeed, and in this case one of them is actually denied a living. The Government is so apprehensive that a foreigner will become a charge on the community that it actually makes a charge of him.

In the case of Mr. Freese the Government is half to blame for dallying these ten long years with his application. The other half of the blame falls directly upon the head of the petty meddler who drew up the recent New York City ordinance denying an operator's license to anyone but citizens of the United States. Mr. Freese is at liberty to operate a picture machine in any other city, if anyone will give him a position, and therein can be seen the stupendously amazing tyranny of a petty official in passing a city ordinance that is clearly national in its scope. If it is wrong for a competent foreigner to operate a picture machine in New York City, it is wrong for him to operate in any other city. And if it is wrong in every city, then certainly it is wrong for any foreigner to follow any trade in any city of the United States, no matter how skilled or unskilled he may be. He may pay taxes and do army duty and all that, but he must not try to make a living.

Mr. Freese came to America when a boy, nineteen years ago. He showed us his honorable discharge papers from Company "A," Eighth New York Regiment Volunteers, which reads: "Service—Honest and faithful. Character—Excellent." After the Spanish-American War, being then a young man of twenty-six years, he learned the operating business and has been at it ever since, and it is practically the only business that he knows anything about.

During these ten years that he has been an operator, Mr. Freese has applied many times for citizen's papers, only to meet with the same endless red tape that has already become a public disgrace, and a discouragement to many worthy applicants. Each time he went to the Naturalization Bureau he was obliged to bring a reputable citizen to vouch for him, but after a while the reputable citizens grew tired of wasting their valuable time trotting down town on fools' errands, and refused to do so any more, until finally Mr. Freese himself lost hope and gave it up as a bad job.

This gentleman knows his business from A to Z. For a number of years he was a road operator and latterly he has been located in New York City. He has worked at Ganes' Manhattan Theater, Thirty-first street and Broadway, and was filling a $25 position at the American Music Hall, Brighton Beach, until August 2, when the inspector took up his 1909 card. He passed the new examination with ease, but with results as we have here set forth. Thus at the age of thirty-six he finds himself disqualified and denied the privilege of supporting himself, his wife, and those six little American-born kids.

We have some vague information to the effect that a foreign-born man having done army service is entitled to first papers. We also believe that this case would not stand the test of law, but that all means time and money and red tape, so what is the man going to do for bread and butter in the meantime? Perhaps some of our readers in other cities can answer that by writing to Mr. Freese when there is a position to be filled.

SUNDAY SHOWS SANCTIONED BY MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

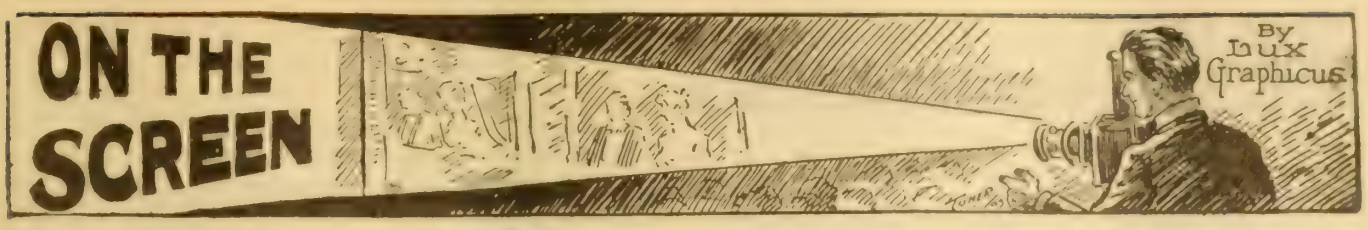
Operating moving picture shows on Sunday, when the pictures are moral and there is no disorder, received the sanction of the Minnesota Supreme Court last week, in an opinion written by Justice Lewis. So long as the "repose and religious liberty of a community" is not disturbed by the productions, they are not held to be unlawful.

The opinion came in the case of D. W. Chamberlain, who was arrested at Mankato and fined in municipal court for keeping the Unique Theater open on the Sabbath day. He appealed and the Supreme Court reversed the decision. In his opinion, Justice Lewis said:

"It has never been the legislative policy in this State to strictly enforce the cessation of all kinds of work and amusements on the Sabbath day. The leading principle all through the leading enactments upon the subject is to prevent any serious interruption of the repose of religious liberty of the community. This means it has not been the intention to interfere with the freedom of the public in the pursuit of amusement and relaxation on the Sabbath day when it does not seriously interfere with the rights of other members of the community who desire a quiet and uninterrupted observance of the day.

"But it should be understood that our decision is based on the evidence in this particular case and it should not be understood that moving picture shows and similar entertainments may not be abated under other provisions of the law when unwholesome in character or improperly conducted."

Jos. Levi, slide maker, dropped in for a social call one day this week. Joe has been under the doctor's care for some time but says that he now feels better than he ever did. Business is good and prospects better and he expects to do big things with a new scheme he has just started. This is furnishing slides and lecturettes of important public events in record time, which he is enabled to do by special arrangement with the Associated Press. If this project succeeds, as he expects it will, the premises at 31 Union Square will soon be too small.



The lure of the pen to the average well educated boy is as magnetic as the lure of the stage is to the average well educated girl. To be a great editor, a great author, is the dream of millions of boys this moment; to be a great actress is the ambition of millions of girls. It all looks so easy, so profitable, so attractive. You not only make a fortune but you also acquire fame: a delightful combination. Some men become famous and don't make a fortune; others acquire the fortune and are unknown to fame. We seldom get all we aspire to in this world. Perhaps it's as well we don't. If I got all that I once aspired to, besides being famous, I might have stood in the shoes of a very harmless looking gentleman whom I saw on the White Star liner "Baltic" the other day. This was John Pierpont Morgan seeing his son off to Europe. Mr. Morgan looked very unimpressive, very badly dressed, not particularly happy, and not particularly well. Upon my word though I need money as much as any man and have yearned to be rich, I don't think I would care to change places with J. P. M. at the price.

I never started out in life to be a financier. I wanted to be an editor. So I am and have been. Of course like most of my fellow pilgrims towards that bourne whence no traveler returns, if I had my time over again I would have been something else—a lawyer or an architect. Both these professions were open to me. But the lure of the pen triumphed, and that is why, to come right to the point, I, in common with all newspaper men, take a deep interest in everything that concerns the press, both inside and outside a newspaper office. More particularly am I concerned in outside views of newspaper life. I like to read about it in books, I like to study newspaper plays and I like to study newspaper films when they appear on the screen.

It was, therefore, with more than ordinary interest that I last week sat and watched the forthcoming Edison release dealing with a very human side of newspaper life. This is called "A Great Scoop." Having brought off a few scoops myself, I was eager to learn what sort of story the Edison Company were about to offer the public. Before the film started I was told that I was going to see a right good strong dramatic piece of work. So I did. And, before I go any further, let me pay the "powers that be" of the great Bronx studio, the well deserved compliment of saying that in the photographic, histrionic and dramatic qualities of their pictures, they are making, and have made, really marvelous advances over the work of a few months ago. It is the barest justice to say that, as a result of recent efforts, there is nothing better on the world's market to-day than an Edison moving picture.

But to the story of this great scoop. Out of the hurry, scurry and bustle of an editor's room at night time, right here in New York City, issues the painful fact that a young reporter has "put a hole in his manners," is fired and goes home to his young wife with the melancholy news. All looks lost to the poor chap, but Providence seems determined to give him one more chance. Having a quick ear he absorbs the substance of a chance conversation between two men relative to the financial condition of a well known bank. Here the exciting plot starts in real earnest.

One of the men drops a paper. The reporter picks it up and follows the two men to Wall street. Now I quote a condensed description of the remainder of the story from the "New York Times":

"The next scene shows the directors of the institution in consultation. The reporter gains admission by bringing back the paper and by a trick on the telephone he hears the bank examiner declare that the bank must close its doors. The reporter notifies the office, the presses are stopped until he appears and dictates his story to a typewriter. When the paper is out the reporter is reinstated and his friends invite him to go out and celebrate, but he refuses. He hastens home to his wife and the film closes with him locked in her arms."

I see the writer of the above questions the methods and morals of the scoop. But the end justified the means. I wanted to see that young reporter reinstated. My heart was in my mouth all the time the film was being shown lest he should fail in his desperate enterprise! I sympathized so much with the young wife at home who might have to suffer terribly for this poor boy's slip and his possible failure to atone for it. For, alas! I know something of the shadows as well as the lights of newspaper life. When he picked up the dropped paper in the downtown cafe, said I to myself said I: "There is hope for him and that poor girl yet."

Then I watched him at the very realistically presented directors' meeting. Would he be discovered and unceremoniously ejected from the building? No, thank goodness, he was not. Would he be detected in the act of tampering with the telephone so that he could hear outside of the directors' room what was going on inside? Thank goodness he wasn't. The excitement of the picture increased. The boy got command of the telephone board in the outer lobby and sat and listened to what was going on amongst the directors. Yet there was an inconvenient porter or janitor, who might have detected and stopped him, who seemed to be hovering around at awkward moments. He only hovered! He didn't stop the boy in his eavesdropping. So the first half of the great scoop was accomplished! How to make use of it! The newspaper office was notified and the boy commenced his rapid journey up town by automobile and otherwise.

Meanwhile in the newspaper office the presses had not commenced to run. Still it was getting dangerously near one o'clock, the appointed moment of going to press! There on the screen was the clock telling us irrefragably that it was a quarter to one; ten minutes to one; five minutes to one! Would the boy reach the office in time? Would the great scoop really come off? Would the young wife be made happy again? Would the boy himself recover his position by his pluck, daring and adroitness? Thank goodness he did. He reached the office just before one o'clock! Then this fine piece of newspaper drama ended by the exhibition on the screen of the news item, for which the boy had worked so hard, his restoration to his position and to the arms of his once more happy young wife. A splendid story splendidly told!

I like this story and its moral. It is true to life, although perhaps it rather strains the probabilities. But then, if in our films and our fiction we stuck too rigidly to the probabilities, we should not have any films and we should not have any fiction. Then; I like the lesson which this film teaches in an unpretentious way. The young reporter is given another chance, showing that, after all, even a grumpy old night editor may have a tender heart and be justified of his tenderness.

A very readable book could be written about newspaper scoops. As a matter of fact newspaper scoops are in process of being achieved around us daily in New York City and other large centers of population

Newspaper life has its joys and sorrows like every other calling. Its rewards are perhaps not commensurate with the mental outlay that it necessitates. A few newspaper proprietors get wealthy but the rank and file of the workers do not make money in the accepted meaning of the term. They just lead interesting, varied, busy lives, which are occasionally punctuated by the pleasure of a scoop. It is a pleasure, I assure you, to pull off a scoop, that is to get a bit ahead of the other fellow. Then again the blessed St. Peter is popularly supposed to have a warm corner in his heart for newspaper men—or at least some of them. A very wealthy man once knocked at the Celestial gate. "Name and profession!" said the Saint. "John Smith, publisher," was the reply. "No place for publishers," said the Saint, "you had the time of your life on earth!" Another knock. "Name and profession, please," repeated the Saint. "William Smith, editor," was the reply. "Come in, my boy," said the sympathetic Saint, "you had a darn rough time of it down below." So he did; so they do.

"The Lady and the Burglar" (Edison).—The dramatic elements in this piece are so badly mixed that few would be able to untangle them until they work out to their conclusion. The professor, the young wife, the gallant whose attentions are unwelcome but persistent, the burglar and his little daughter. The story becomes absorbing as the film passes, and the complications increase. Then comes the end, a denouement as unexpected as it is interesting. The acting is sympathetic and leads up to the end in a way that holds the attention closely to the last. The photography is clear, adding much to the pleasure the picture excites. The Edison scheme of toning the film different colors might be open to question if it were not used with so much discretion. As it is now done it adds to most films and sometimes one fancies it is a relief to the eye. One color may, under some circumstances, become monotonous, though this would never occur with an interesting film. The variety introduced by different tones is worth while considering as a phase of motion picture work.

"Camel and Horse Racing in Egypt" (Urban).—An educational film of merit, presenting views of both camel and horse racing. The reproduction of characteristic scenery and persons, adds much to the interest, though the floundering movements of the great ungainly camels while racing are well worth seeing. It is photographed with the same degree of excellence which characterizes all the Urban outdoor work.

"Under Both Flags" (Pathe).—A thrilling war picture, filled with graphic illustrations of the grim life of conflict which confronts a soldier. The realities are all there, some of them reproduced with such accuracy that one almost sees an actual scene passing before his eyes. And when it is past he becomes more than ever convinced that war should be abolished. The motion picture is one of the most eloquent advocates of universal peace the world has ever known.

"The Witch of Carabosse" (Urban).—A reproduction of a mediaeval legend, representing a witch who lived in some ruins and was the terror of all the people round about. Finally, a pompous individual falls into her clutches, and before he escapes he leaves a few things which amuse the audience, but contribute to his humiliation. The pictorial work about the ruins is beautifully done. The story itself is not as strong as the excellent mechanical work deserves.

"The Death of Michael Grady" (Vitagraph).—Meddling neighbors are determined to kill Mike who has a serious enough stomach ache. And when all the usual accompaniments of a funeral are in progress and Mike appears in his long white robe there is an exit which would do credit to almost any situation that might. Then Mike and his wife hold a wake of their own, just to assure themselves that he is not dead, while the chagrined neighbors appear one by one to offer congratulations upon Mike's fortunate escape from death and the grave.

"Up-to-Date Servants" (Essanay).—Cinderella up to date would be quite as appropriate as the title given this picture. Anyhow, a servant, impersonating her mistress at a ball, makes a hit with a young man, loses a slipper in a hasty flight and not until she appears in the young man's drawing-room is he able to dispose of his fit of the dumps. Then comes a toast as Marie puts on the slipper. Without being in any sense great, or even strong, this film is diverting and enables an audience to while away a few minutes very pleasantly. There is plenty of life and animation and some of the incidents are distinctly humorous. The entire film is a burlesque of exceptional quality, certain to attract favorable attention.

"The Borrowed Baby" (Kalem).—A mix-up which raises shouts of laughter. An amateur dramatic society requires a baby in its cast. Accordingly one is borrowed to play the role. What happens is as funny as anything Kalem has ever put out. Then when the leading man returns the borrowed youngster, is arrested by the constable, and the picture ends with everybody struggling to explain, the hilarity knows no bounds. It is a comedy overflowing with life and offering a pleasing contrast to the hackneyed sort. Not the least amusing is the experience of the unsuspecting baby at the hands of the cast.

"Her Photograph" (Pathe).—A comedy presenting amusing situations and offering opportunities for a laugh. Acted with the usual vim of the Pathe players and photographed with skill, it has concealed about it a series of hearty laughs.

"The Ibis" (Pathe).—An educational film presenting the Ibis, unfamiliar to a larger proportion of the people of this continent, yet at one time an important object in the life of the most influential nation in history. Photographed with the appreciation of pictorial possibilities which characterizes all the Pathe work, this film is a welcome addition to the long series of educational pictures put out by the house.

"On the Banks of the Zuyder Zee, Holland" (Urban).—A travel picture presenting interesting phases of life, together with much picturesque scenery, as seen upon the banks of this sea. The quaint and picturesque buildings and the strangely garbed people, all reproduced with fidelity and appreciation, combine to make a series of views instructive as well as interesting. Holland is a poet's and artist's country and this picture goes a long way toward establishing this fact firmly in the minds of the common people.

"The Girl on Triple X" (Essanay).—A Western story with a girl as the storm center and a jealous would-be lover as the promoter of the mischief. An innocent man is led to execution and barely escapes through the intervention of an Indian he had befriended, who exposes the whole miserable business. The mischief maker changes places with the first man led to execution and the film ends, with the imagination supplying such details as are lacking, but not missed. The mounting of a horse and riding away with one's hands tied is a feat few would undertake to accomplish, yet one of the actors performs it successfully and saves his benefactor's life. This is a graphic bit of work and adds materially to the interest of the film. The fact that the film closes with the execution suggested is to be commended. It is time those relics of barbarous times were eliminated from the films. A suggestion is quite as effective as the real scene, as is shown by this picture.

"Drifts of Snow in the Chamounix Valley" (Gaumont).—A beautiful reproduction of snow drifts which really represent snow. The operator performed his part and was followed by the others in turn who produced a film that presents snow with such fidelity to nature that one can appreciate what it means. Often these snow pictures are mere masses of white and black, with none of the delicate shadows and half tones which make pictures of snow so beautiful. In this instance all objections of that character are overcome and the picture shows the huge drifts, shot with all the delicate tones and shadows which make snow beautiful. The picture is worthy of commendation from every standpoint.

"Oliver Twist" (Pathe).—Lovers of Dickens will be pleased to see this reproduction of one of his great stories. It is one thing to read the story, getting into as close sympathy as possible with the characters, and quite another to see those characters step out of a book and perform their parts with all the life and animation with which one's imagination may have endowed them. While the writer of this confesses to an inability to say whether all the minor details of the picture are in accord with the facts, he does not hesitate to say that it seems to depict it as he understands it in its main features. There is a wealth of scenery and staging which is supposed to be historically correct and probably is, as near so as possible now. Perhaps the principal thing to be considered is the fuller appreciation of the author's work which will follow this illustration. To see one's book live and move is well worth while, but not until the motion picture came was it possible. The adequate production of the work of great authors helps the cause of literature and plays an important part in the development of literary taste among thousands who perhaps never had the opportunity or time to read the works presented.

"The Turn of the Balance" (Vitagraph).—A society love story which will appeal to many with an irresistible force because it seems to reproduce a genuine heart interest. A wealthy young woman comes to the aid of her sweetheart when he most needs it, supplying a denouement which cannot fail to please. The picture is admirably produced mechanically and the actors make the story strong by their sympathetic work.

"The Attack on the Mill" (Edison).—Adapted from a story by Emile Zola and representing an episode of the Franco-Prussian War. In most particulars this is a more than usually attractive production. The situations are exceptionally dramatic, leading up to the denouement which is fully as dramatic as the situations that preceded. The scenery is in keeping with the subject and, moreover, is beautiful. Some of it makes pictures well worth seeing apart from any connection they have with the story. The careful attention to details which characterizes the Edison pictures is seen here, as in other pictures presented by the house. Perhaps those familiar with the life and scenes depicted can find minor faults here and there, but it is well to remind them that the great bulk of those who see motion pictures look to the story and the way it is developed, rather than to the small things which some critics profess to see. This story moves forward with a rush and a swing which holds the attention until the film ends. It is a good picture and one that will stir the emotions and thrill with its situations.

"The Red Girl and the Child" (Pathe).—An example of the Pathe invasion of the American West. The photography is well done and the story is told well enough to hold the attention. The Pathe characters are plainly observable, and while they are sufficient to overcome many faults, it can be said with truth that not yet have the actors caught the spirit of the wonderful region, nor do they seem able to interpret the life they find as sympathetically as they will after they have studied it more closely. Photographically the film is a splendid specimen of the film makers' art.

"The Call of the Blood" (Kalem).—Will the call of the blood overcome the education and environment of a life entirely different? That question has been asked many times and has been differently answered. This Kalem picture declares as emphatically as actions can speak that the call of the blood is stronger than the influence of education and environment and seems to prove that it is difficult to overcome the impulses bred in the blood for generations. It is a study in heredity well worth seeing and from one standpoint answers the question conclusively. Admirably photographed and graphically acted this film should interest because of the racial story it tells.

"Mrs. Barrington's House Party" (Vitagraph).—A delicate comedy, with choice bits of humor running through it, strengthened by a heart interest as attractive as it is strongly marked. Then there is an elopement, a secret marriage and at the end happiness. The picture, while not great, is at least not unpleasant and develops some situations which rouse one very strongly and hold the attention without flagging for an instant. Well acted, cleanly photographed, reinforced by excellent mechanical finish, the picture will be popular.

"A Salutary Lesson" (Biograph).—What may result from neglect of children, so far as the physical end is concerned, is shown in this picture. The moral results of neglect cannot be depicted at such an early age, yet they are often more serious than the physical. This picture has little or no dramatic strength, but it depicts, with extraordinary fidelity to facts, numerous domestic scenes. Probably everyone can recall instances similar to this and not a few will wish that certain individuals of whom they are reminded could see it. It may, in a way, apply to substantially everyone, since all children sometimes seem to become troublesome and worry their parents. The picture, while not possessing any claims to dramatic power beyond that which is inherent in the subject will, nevertheless, make a profound impression, because it touches upon something which appeals directly to every home. It is one of the strongest sermons upon the neglect of children that has come out in a long time.

"A Change of Heart" (Lubin).—A comedy which discloses with commendable frankness what may happen when a couple incur a change of heart in an unexpected way. Stubbs wanted a wife who was not a dowd, and he got her. But unfortunately before he got her he changed and would have preferred the dowd. When they met next time the reversion was complete in both cases and the shock was too great. They fell fainting into the arms of their friends, leaving one's imagination to supply the missing details. The picture is funny, since it represents such a total transformation, a making over as complete as it is possible to imagine. The acting is lively and offers numerous amusing situations.

"The Return of Ta-wa-wa" (Melies).—An Indian story of unusual interest, embodying a story which has its basis deep in the folk lore of some of the tribes. The interest is maintained by the exceptional care with which Indian life and character is reproduced. The scenery is very elaborate, too, representing several attractive transformations. A description would fail to convey any impression of the scenery and the careful way in which it has been handled. Indian pictures have been numerous, but few have had the elaborate scenery which characterizes this one. So far as can be judged it seems to be accurate and it assists greatly in interpreting the meaning of the picture.

"Lost in the Soudan" (Selig).—A dramatic picture of the desert which will give a better idea of the life of the desert than could be obtained in any other way except by an actual visit. It is a country of romance because it is unknown to but few. Perhaps the pictures here presented, representing the desert and its strange life, will go far to dispel some of the romance and bring the comprehension down to the bare facts. There is all the life and animation which are always present in the Selig pictures. Perhaps the graphic designation of the "land that God forgot" will be borne out by this picture.

"The Usurer" (Biograph).—Whether intended or not the producers of this film have preached a sermon against oppression that should exert an influence against the methods of those who take advantage of the needy. It is a story of an usurer, emphasized by the contrast of the condition of those to whom he has loaned money and his own attendance at expensive banquets in alternate scenes. Dramatically the situation of the dependents is shown, and it is made clear that it is all for gold. The usurer's doom is made dramatic. A widow, whom he has oppressed, faints and in falling pushes his safe door shut with him inside and he is suffocated before the time lock allows the safe to be opened. The determination to get gold, no matter at what cost, has caused unspeakable misery throughout history. This picture represents a modern manifestation of this greed. Not all usurers are so summarily dealt with, but it is not too much to say that it would be well if they were.

"The District Attorney's Triumph" (Lubin).—A live drama that sets the blood to tingling and makes one quite agree with the girl in the case that there are heroes to-day as much as there were in the days of King Arthur. The commonplace achievement of convicting a murderer does not appeal to the dreamy, romantic girl, but when the attorney dramatically captures the escaped convict she decides that such a deed is a fair substitute and sensibly accepts the capable young man. Much of life is represented in this film and it should be popular with all audiences.

"The Duck Farm" (Lubin).—A short industrial made on the famous duck farm at Allentown, Pa., and representing every stage in a duck's life. A duck is an interesting bird, largely because of its clumsy movements, and this brief epitome of a duck's life, admirably photographed, is a well considered addition to the list of industrial subjects.

"Max Has to Change" (Pathe).—Here is illustrated a predicament, or a series of predicaments, from which Max finds it impossible to extricate himself and finally marries the millionaire's daughter after persuasion at the muzzle of a revolver. Max might wonder what the old man really wanted in the sudden reverses of mind, but the wedding is supposed to have settled the question permanently.

"Back to Life After 2,000 Years" (Pathe).—A bit of comedy representing the awakening and peregrinations of a Caesar after 2,000 years. He might have continued indefinitely, only he fell a victim to the wiles of two modern girls, and the champagne put him where he was helpless. There are some good views of Rome in the film, but the comedy falls short of expectations.

"His New Family" (Edison).—A reproduction of a beautiful story by Roy Norton. Briefly, it relates the experience of a delicate, but manly, French boy who is sent to a Western mining camp only to find that his father, who had migrated previously, had been killed just before his arrival. The story is worked out with the careful attention to detail which characterizes the work of Mr. Norton. There is a delicate blending of pathos and humor which adds to its beauty and performs an important part in the fascination which is a part of the picture. The Edison Company have endeavored to make the picture as nearly perfect as possible, reproducing mining scenery with extreme care, and endeavoring, so far as possible, to correctly interpret the spirit of the original story. The actors have performed their parts with discretion and the mechanical work has been adequately done, the two contributing to a picture excellent in every detail.

"Across Russian Poland" (Gaumont).—Scenes in Poland, including Warsaw, castles, statues, theaters and other public buildings. The Cossack drills are remarkable and the photography of these drills, with all their complicated movements clearly shown is a mechanical triumph. The views are chosen with a view to representing their most picturesque aspects, and the reproduction has been managed with more than ordinary ability. The result is a series of views which afford a good idea of what Poland really looks like and really is. Like all the Gaumont films of this type this one is interpretative of the country and its inhabitants and therefore instructs and entertains at the same time.

"The Estrangement" (Gaumont).—A story of a difficulty between a man and wife, ending with a separation that lasted for years, but was eventually ended and presumably they lived happily ever after. It represents a domestic tragedy that is possible, but not probable, and undoubtedly rare. Aside from this the film has no particular interest, nor is any special ability exhibited in the acting.

INDEPENDENT.

"The Animated Scarecrow" (Atlas).—A vigorous chase which presents a novelty in a scarecrow that runs. Of course, Willie should have heeded the farmer's warning and kept away from the farm. But where a girl is involved it is difficult to mind injunctions of that sort, hence the lively complications that follow. There is lots of fun in this chase, and when finally he jumps into the river to extinguish the flames the constable seizes him. The ruin along his path testify to the vigor of his flight.

"The Wrong Bag" (Atlas).—A long list of complications follow an accidental change of bags. A lively scramble results when Mrs. Jenks discovers the situation, but ultimately, all the tangles are unraveled and Jenks is received once more into his home. The mix-ups are the only features of the picture worth considering.

"A Cowboy's Pledge" (Champion).—Quite like the old-time story books there is a touch of heart interest in this film which somehow atones for shortcomings in acting and photography in some degree. That a lover should descend to a drunken sot does not seem unusual. That he should return after two years a parson is a stretch of belief which can possibly be overlooked. The girl's vigor in chastising her lover and her constancy are both attractive qualities and really make the film. It contains little else of interest.

"Hearts of Gold" (Nestor).—The story of the adventures of a girl who donned her brother's clothes to get work. Nothing of any particular novelty is introduced and the situations present no features of particular interest. The earnestness of the girl and her desire to help are commendable virtues, yet are scarcely sufficient for an emotional motion picture.

"The Broker's Daughter" (Yankee).—Many another man has gone broke in Wall street, and many another daughter has been compelled to give up bright prospects because of difficulties thus encountered. Not all, however, are fortunate enough to have for a prospective son-in-law a gentleman who sticks by his vows, regardless of the circumstances of the girl. Though she turned away from him he finds her and the ruined father receives a son-in-law worth having. In this the picture is different, and the heart interest here added seems genuine.

"Fricot Drinks a Bottle of Horse Embrocation." (Ambrosio).—And as soon as he does a long series of amusing troubles begin. The unfortunate victim succeeds in translating an incident as serious as this into a succession of funny experiences and develops some extremely sensational situations before the effects disappear.

"The Stolen Policeman" (Great Northern).—A funny story of a policeman's attempt at courtship. The strength of the picture lies chiefly in the unexpected climax which seems entirely at variance with what one would naturally expect. The film is lively, with good acting and satisfactory mechanical work to help make it attactive.

"The Prairie Postmistress" (Bison).—A Western story with a letter with money in it as a motive for robbery. The thieves get it from Grace, but her friends give chase and by a sensational shot one picks the letter from the thief's hand. Then away again to save the old couple before their home is taken away. All is accomplished in good time and Dick gets—well, his reward is the postmistress herself, which probably more than compensates him. There is plenty of life and action, and the chases are good examples of hard riding. Sometimes when looking at these long Western chases one wishes they could be shortened. The pictures wouldn't be hurt and the effect upon the audience would be improved. To ride over an apparently interminable road when a person is supposed to be dying, or, as in this case, when some other serious thing is impending, seems wholly wrong and it gives rise to a species of suspense that is not pleasant.

"Lena Rivers" (Thanhouser).—A reproduction of one of Mary J. Holmes' stories which were once very popular. It is the story of a poor girl marrying a wealthy man and through certain complications losing sight of his wife and baby. The mother dies without his seeing her again, but ultimately he finds the baby, a grown woman, and the story ends happily. To those who have read Lena Rivers with pleasure the picture will be more than ordinarily entertaining. To those who have not read the story the film presents a narrative not without its interest and offering a quarter hour's diversion well worth while.

"The Life Boat" (Great Northern).—This film was made to illustrate the manoeuvers of a life saving station's crew. It is a record picture, but so admirably done that the men seem to be actually working before the audience. It will convey to many thousands who have no other means of knowing what a life saving crew actually does.

"An Indian Squaw's Sacrifice" (Defender).—A heart story, starting with a robbery committed by one man for which another takes the blame, a marriage with an Indian squaw and a turn of events which brought the man and his first love together again. When the Indian wife learns the state of affairs she commits suicide so that there will be no obstacle to her husband and his first love marrying. This may be a good story, but it seems as though a wedding following a sacrifice of this sort could not be happy. There is something in marriage beyond the ceremony, yet it is treated by some who make stories as a matter which can be assumed or dissolved, as may seem best.

"Charles Le Tremeraire" (Film d'Art).—A picture with elaborate settings, scenery and good acting, one which will hold the attention by its artistic excellence quite as much as by its story. The producer has brought all the arts of the dramatist and the scenery producer to his aid and the result is a picture which is satisfactory from these two important standpoints.

"The Oedipus King" (Film d'Art).—A film in which art in setting and costuming has been invoked to make a picture worth seeing. The work has been done with care and close attention to details and the acting is in harmony with the subject.

"The Hoodoo Alarm Clock" (Imp).—A story that might happen, yet perhaps seldom, since few men are so unaccustomed to being called away suddenly that they mix things up in this way. Mr. Smith has a merry time in his preparations and all sorts of difficulties confront him. He overcomes them all, however, until the last. When he misses his train he can't overcome that and consequently proceeds to give his sorrows a swim. It is a very lively picture and Mr. Smith's adventures arouse the hilarity of the audience to a marked degree.

"The Colonel's Boot" (Eclair).—A love story with the usual objecting parent. Humorous complications ensue when a note intended for the girl falls into the father's boot. After all sorts of unsuccessful attempts the note is recaptured and the young man, for his prompt rescue of the father, is given the girl.

"The Monkey Showman of Djibal" (Eclair).—A good illustration of one of the monkey shows which are so common in Egypt. This film represents the remarkable intelligence of the animals and shows what can be done with them under proper training. All Egypt is fond of these shows and after seeing this film one is disposed to commend the Egyptians for their liking.

"Among the Roses" (Imp).—A love story developed among rose bushes and based upon a charitable girl's visits to a wealthy man's garden from which she took roses to carry to the poor and sick. He falls in love with her when he catches her purloining his flowers and a wedding follows in due course. Some of the scenes, with the roses in bloom are beautiful, though the story is somewhat commonplace.

"A Heroic Coward" (Yankee).—Not all bravery is physical and there is a snap and vim to this picture which thrills one as it runs. It is one thing to fear a blow and quite another to face a dangerous disease. When the coward who refused to fight suddenly soundly thrashes a bully and cares for a smallpox patient, the opinion of the town changes. It is sometimes a revelation to the thoughtless crowd to understand that physical bravery is not the only kind and, as in this instance, some of the most apparent cowards have proved themselves heroes.

"A Woman's Better Nature" (Bison).—This picture may serve to while away time, but the representation of gamblers and blackmailers can perform no useful service, consequently it would be difficult to say why this film exists. Of course such evils are present in the world, but it is hardly good taste to put them on the screen. They are neither entertaining nor instructive, nor do they perform any other useful service. It would be quite as well to forget this one.

The Berlin Aniline Works, of 213 Water street, New York City, are receiving monthly shipments of the well-known "Agfa" positive film. This film, we are pleased to learn, is meeting with great success in the trade on account of its very fine photographic qualities. We have seen some recent releases made on the film and were much impressed by the beauty of the pictures. "Agfa" shipments will shortly be increased in quantity, and we also understand that the negative film will be placed on the market in due course.

CHICAGO NOTES.

The Knights Templars are gone and Chicago is settling down to normal. The decorations are fast disappearing while the weather man, who did his best to have a real hot Summer time for the conclave, is now letting everything loose, high wind, thunder and rain are taking possession of the city.

Although the Summer has been a very hot one, the moving picture theaters do not seem to have suffered much; in fact the good houses, the ones showing the best pictures, are reporting very good business and, to quote some of them, their patronage is better this Summer than it was last year. Such a statement is another blow to those who claim that motion pictures are dying out.

When you can find persons, even old ladies of 80 years, climb up three flights of stairs on a hot August day, stop at each landing to wipe off the perspiration and regain their breath, all this for the sake of seeing good pictures as the American Film Service, noted as the "House of Specials," give to the very enterprising George Gilmore, the man with his theater on a third floor, we have to confess that high class pictures are the keynote of the business.

The Ideal, Mr. Gilmore's third-story theater, was packed to the doors and the spectators did not offer a complaint, did not call for elevators, as, after witnessing on the screen "Lost in the Soudan," of Selig, and "The Turn of the Balance," of the Vitagraph Company, they seemed to agree that the efforts of climbing three flights of stairs was more than rewarded by the excellent show.

Both the Janet and the Orchard, the direct competitors of Mr. Gilmore, were playing to crowded houses. These two theaters are known as some of the finest specimens of construction in Chicago. The great attraction at the Janet is the Mirror Screen, which seems to be as popular on North avenue as it is at either the Garfield or the Elite Theaters.

If fine looking houses are an attraction by themselves, the exhibitors must not get into their heads because they have finely decorated walls they can show a cheap service.

On Cottage Grove we have a vivid illustration of this principle.

The Swanson Theater, at Thirty-ninth street, has been proclaimed the finest moving picture theater of Chicago, and is such a fine specimen of architecture that a view of it was reproduced in this paper.

The house is still there, so are the decorations, but the service is not what it should be. The Swanson runs Independent films. Is it a matter of economy or is it that the manager does not fully sympathize with the Independent manufacturers? We cannot tell, but too many old and out-of-date licensed pictures are thrown on the screen. If rain storms or, as the German lady of Cincinnati called them, "strings" are discouraging to an audience, we can safely say that the bad taste displayed in the lobby is still worse. The cheap looking posters are not framed, but are merely nailed and some of them pasted on the fine wall decorations of the lobby. In many cases the numerous posters run the appearance of what at one time was considered the best decorated lobby. We never saw anything so vulgar and such carelessness on the part of the management is enough to discourage folks from visiting the place.

This is no pure imagination, as the great success of the Washington Theater, only three blocks away from the Swanson, Cottage Grove and Forty-third street, is a proof that a well managed house, showing good pictures, will catch more nickels than fine exterior decorations and grand lighting display.

The Washington, as can be seen by the accompanying illustration, although a good looking house, has not the high pretention of the Swanson Theater, yet the Washington is a money making institution.

Mr. Wheelan, the owner, has been in the theatrical business; there he gained the practical experience, the success of his present enterprise. Mr. Wheelan is one of the few exhibitors who have the real knack to understand the wishes of their audiences. He pays no attention to the applause of a few ignorant spectators, who laugh and clap their hands at any silly or vulgar scene, as he knows that the few noisy ones do not represent the majority. Mr. Wheelan is a good judge and he can read on the faces of the most stern spectators their impressions, if they have been pleased or not.

Knowing his audience and doing his best to cater to their taste, Mr. Wheelan has built such a reputation that his theater is considered a high class place of amusement and is patronized by the best classes.

Mr. Wheelan is a great lover of music and he claims that good music can increase the beauty of a picture. He waits patiently for the day when pictures will not be changed every day but shown two or three days in succession, then he will devote a morning to study the pictures, to rehearse his music and be fully prepared to give the most perfect accompaniment with each picture.

This day is not far off, as with the great productions of to-day and the great efforts of the manufacturers to still improve the work, there is already a demand for repeaters, if we can use this term.

If the Independents could join hands with the licensed manufacturers in an effort to clear the market of all the old junk we would soon come back to the old regime of changing the program only twice a week. J. M. B.

WASHINGTON THEATER (CHICAGO).

ST. LOUIS THE CITY OF AIRDOMES.

St. Louis, Mo., can boast of having some of the finest airdomes of any other large city, and more of them, a few of which deserve special mention. The Empress Airdome, located nearest to the business center of the city, has a very attractive front, well illuminated. The interior is laid out with nicely arranged flower beds on each side of the stage, with lights arranged to show them off. This place seats 1,000, running three reels of the latest licensed films and three acts of vaudeville, always playing to capacity.

The Hamilton Airdome, situated in the West End, which is the bon-ton residence district, has a seating capacity of 2,500, also using licensed service, three reels and vaudeville, playing to packed houses nightly.

The Rustic Airdome, on the South Side, is one of the most unique amusement resorts in the city. The entrance is constructed of rustic branches cut from white oak trees, also the entire stage built the same, beautifully illuminated with colored lights. This place uses licensed film and vaudeville, playing three performances every night to capacity. There are a great many others which I will make mention of later, most of these places are well managed and have nicely uniformed attendants, which lends tone to the theaters.

J. M. DUBBS.

Charles Farrel, of 451 Ellicott Square, Buffalo, N. Y., gives evidence of being a hustling promoter, as well as giving careful consideration to the elements that are vital to the success of motion picture theaters. He is a firm believer in the Motiograph, and says: "I have promoted the Cazenovia, Palace, Unique, Liberty and Bailey theaters in this locality and in each has been installed a Motiograph motion picture machine." Mr. Farrel is an old theatrical man and considers himself well posted in the moving picture business. He says he recognizes the quality of pictures projected by the Motiograph, the excellent workmanship, its durability and convenience to the operator, and considers it a strong asset to any moving picture theater.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

Questions and Answers.—Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Mistaken Ideas.—Maryland (I suppress name of city purposely) writes as follows: "With reference to the resistance problem from Homer, Ill., July 2 issue, it appears very simple and plain to me why Homer gets more current through combination No. 2 than through No. 1 (page 27, July 2). However, I don't know that I can explain myself so that you will understand my version of the matter. If we were working on a 110-volt line, using a 110-volt rheostat which delivered 15 amperes when connected in series, and we connect another of the same kind in series-multiple we would get 30 amperes. Now if the second rheostat be adjustable and we found 30 amperes to be too much, by cutting out a coil or two we could reduce the current flow to about 25 amperes, because rheostats connected in series-multiple draw current instead of holding it back. At least that is my idea of it. Now Homer did exactly the same thing, only he had 550 volts instead of 110, so he, of course, had to use five 110-volt rheostats instead of one. Through combination No. 1 he found he got 15 amperes, which was too little, as he only got a yellow light. Then he connected five more rheostats in series-multiple, but finding he then got too much he cut out one of the rheostats in the series-multiple, which amounted to the same thing as cutting out one or two coils of a rheostat. Of course I could go into this matter more fully, but believe the foregoing will convey my idea. But I might add that Homer got the same result with his nine rheostats that he would have gotten with two 550-volt rheostats, one connected in series and the other in series-multiple, with a couple of coils cut out of the latter. Glad to note the Column is increasing in size. It is the most valuable portion of the paper, which is, however, all most excellent."

Maryland is badly mixed in his ideas as to resistance and I shall devote considerable space this week to setting him right, since there seems to be very many who are tangled on the same proposition. In the first place, the term "series-multiple" is a misnomer, as applied to rheostats. You may have a combination of series and multiple (A, Fig. 1), but series-multiple would mean a connection like B, Fig. 2, and multiple series like C, Fig. 2. Of course it is understood that all rheostats are, strictly speaking, in series with the lamp, no matter how they may be connected to each other. What Homer had was, so far as I can see, an utterly senseless connection—a series followed by a multiple. The point is right here: the series would let through a certain amount of current and no more. Now if Homer really got more current from combination No. 2 than from No. 1 it simply means, so far as I can see, that the multiple itself generated current. As a matter of fact the multiple would, or should, operate to yet further cut down the current that got past the series. I can see no other solution and if there is any other I certainly should be glad to be set right. Now regarding the matter of series and multiple: as above intimated, any multiple connection is "series-multiple" in that the rheostats are in multiple and the multiple, taken as a whole, is in series with the lamp (D, Fig. 1). A true series multiple or multiple series (B and C, Fig. 1) would, however, be an utterly absurd connection as applied to resistance for a projection arc lamp. A multiple connection (D, Fig. 1) does not "draw" current, as Maryland supposes. It holds back the current exactly as does any other resistance connected in series with a lamp, but the multiple establishes two or more paths for the current exactly as is illustrated in (E, Fig. 1). Here we have a 12-inch water main under pressure which is able, and more than able, to furnish water up to the entire capacity of the 6-inch pipe, one end of which latter is connected to a water motor. We establish a connection between the 12-inch main and the 6-inch pipe by means of a 1-inch pipe (1, E, Fig. 1) controlled by the valve 2. We set this valve wide open but find that we do not get sufficient water through it to operate the motor satisfactorily. In the 12-inch main is ample water and the 6-inch pipe will carry much more than the 1-inch connecting pipe will convey. We establish another 1-inch connecting pipe, as shown by the dotted lines, and we now get precisely twice the flow of water, the large main being ample to furnish it and the 6-inch pipe large enough to take care of it. Now if you will look at F, or D, Fig. 1, which are both plain multiple connections, you will observe that, substituting electricity for water and wires for pipes, the two propositions are identical—one and the same. In the case of the water you establish two pipes controlled by two valves. In the case of the electricity you establish two connection wires controlled by two rheostats, each of which will let through a certain number of amperes and no more. Should you cut the supply wire at X you would simply have a plain one rheostat connection left, since the cutting of the wire at that point would in no manner affect the operation of one of the rheostats, which would continue to furnish current to its capacity. If, on the other hand, instead of cutting at X you were to cut the wire at Z you would merely "cut out" the other rheostat, while the one eliminated in the first example would continue to work right along, furnishing current to its full capacity—one-half the amperes furnished by the multiple, provided both rheostats be the same size. It also follows that were you to cut out one or more coils of one of the rheostats you would increase the total current flow, since you would decrease the resistance offered by one of the rheostats. Multiple is simply a proposition of establishing two or more paths, entirely separate and distinct from each other, for the current, between a supply wire carrying unlimited (up to its capacity) amperage and a secondary wire connected directly to the lamp. Maryland should remember, when he speaks of "drawing current" that current on a wire is under pressure (voltage) exactly as steam in a boiler is under pressure. Offer it the chance to connect with the opposite wire of the circuit and you don't have to "draw" it—not on your life! It will get there fast enough without any "drawing." I might add that in a multiple you may use two rheostats of different capacities, say one of 15 and one of 25, for instance. Through such a connection you would get the sum of 15 and 25, or 40 amperes of current. Remember these two facts, viz.: each standard, non-adjustable rheostat is made to pass a certain, definite number of amperes of current on a given pressure. (a) That rheostat cannot be used on a higher pressure than it is made for. (b) That the resistance a given wire (wire of a given material) offers to a given current strength increases as the length of the wire increases or as its diameter decreases and, conversely, decreases as the length decreases or the diameter increases. Two rheostats hooked up in series become, in effect, one rheostat. By hooking two rheostats, of equal total length and diameter of resistance wire, in series, you simply exactly double the length of the wire, thus increasing the resistance through which the current must pass. Hence the current (amperes) is cut down. By hooking them in multiple you also double the resistance placed in the circuit, but you offer two distinct paths for the current and in neither of them is the resistance increased in the least, hence the analogy of the water pipes.

Size of Wire.—Richford, Vt., writes: "Have a 60-cycle, 110-volt, 60-ampere choke coil. I desire to locate the coil in the ticket office, 50 feet from the lamp, so that it will furnish heat in Winter. Would a No. 6 wire be large enough to avoid line drop?"

No. 6, solid or 7 stranded, will carry the current all right as it is (weatherproof insulation) rated at 65 amperes, but the Underwriters' rules require that rubber covered insulation be used inside the building and No. 6 rubber covered wire is only rated at 40 amperes, No. 5 at 54 and No. 4 at 65. To be within the Underwriters' requirements, therefore, you must use No. 4 wire for the circuit. The reason for the comparatively low allowance for rubber covered, as compared with weatherproof which has precisely the same actual carrying capacity, is that the least bit of heat knocks out rubber insulation, rendering it non-effective in short order. Summing up: the No. 6 would do the work all right, but you must use No. 4 to be square with the Underwriters' rules.

Shutters and So Forth.—Hays City, Kan., writes: "Kindly answer following questions through the column: (1) How many amperes should I use, A. C., 250-volt, 60 cycles, to project a picture with an ——— machine 80 feet; size of picture, 12 x 16. Am using a Sterling economizer, 110-volt, maximum 60 amperes. (2) Have changed the shutter on my ——— machine to a three-wing, instead of the old two-wing. Don't you thing this is an improvement in reducing the flicker? (3) Could a shutter like the Power's No. 6 be put on my machine with good results by placing it in front of the lens? (4) What size condensing lens would you use on my picture. Am using two 7½ lenses but don't seem to get the proper light."

(1) With a 12 x 16-foot picture you are illuminating 192 square feet of screen and I would run on the 60-ampere contact if it were I. The voltage cuts no figure at all except that your economizer must be wound to suit it. It is entirely the amperage which governs the light intensity. (2) Anything that lessens flicker without producing other equally objectionable things is a most decided improvement. (3) That is a problem which would have to be studied out very carefully. It would be mainly a question of driving it in exact synchronism with the intermittent. (4) Two 7½ lenses should be all right. I am of the opinion that more than likely you will find the trouble with your light is due to the three-wing shutter you have installed. Your machine shutter (the one you took out) cuts more than 50 per cent. of the light. One wing of your three-wing would necessarily have to be the same width as the main blade of the two-wing discarded, your other two wings being divided in the remaining space, and whatever clear space is left would determine the percentage of light you would get. At some future date I will make this more clear by illustrations. In query No. 1 you say you have 250 volts pressure and a 110-volt economizer. This calls for some explanation, since a 110-volt economizer would burn up in just about two shakes and a shiver if hitched up on 250 volts—a most unusual pressure, by the way. Haven't you a three-wire system with 220 across the two outside wires and 110 between the neutral and outside?

Kind Words—A Good Show Succeeds.—Winfield, Kan., writes: "Reading the Column makes me feel personally acquainted with its editor and I think every operator should feel that way. I would not attempt to tell how much I have been benefited by our Operators' Column for it would require two complete issues of The World to do it. I have been running a machine off and on since 1898 and can truthfully say that I have learned more since the Column started than I ever did before. Some who read this may say I must have been a dummy. I care not for that, however, believing in giving honor where honor is due. I have been through the mill, covered as much territory as most of you, and I say right here that the Column will do you, Mr. Operators who sneer, as much good as it has me, providing you pay attention and take an interest in it. Winfield, Kan., is a town of 8,000 to 9,000 souls. I came here last August from Wichita looking up a location. Returned, promoted enough capital to open a house, and did open it August 23, 1909. Have done excellent business ever since. There had been a little show running for three years previous on a five-cent admission. It changed hands pretty regularly every six months and Winfield was considered an absolutely rotten show town. I studied conditions carefully and made up my mind that a high class picture house, with the best available equipment, a nice, clean, attractive front, good opera chairs, courteous attendants, the whole properly managed, could and would transform it into a good instead of a poor show town. Events have amply proven me to be correct! Since then another house equally as good as ours has opened and is doing as much business as we are. But the ultimate effect has been that the moving picture theater in this neck of the woods has been, as a whole, elevated to a higher plane by our example. The day of a worn out machine, folding camp chairs and a bed sheet constituting a money making picture show, combined, of course, with junk film and a near-operator, has departed, thank heaven, forevermore. (Amen.—Ed.) You must have the equipment and produce the goods or you are a back number—a dead one. The small show I spoke of has started twice since we came but both times fell ignominiously by the wayside. The room is now for rent and the equipment for sale—Requiescat in pace! Both houses here have a ten-cent admission. There is no complaint. They will pay the price provided the goods be delivered! Now, gentlemen and brothers in the game, put your shoulders to the wheel of progress by studying and improving in your business. Subscribe to The World and keep them on file for reference. Study the Operators' Column and improve on your past performances, thus boosting for high excellence of the moving picture!"

I have published this letter, though somewhat lengthy, not because it speaks kindly of The World, the Column and its editor, but for the reason that it shows that the right man can step in where others have failed and make a howling success. Last week a correspondent asked about a small town location. I said it was hard to advise since so much depends on the individual. We are, of course, more than pleased that you like the Column, even though we do some roasting, and our hope and aim is to make it even more valuable in the future than in the past. To this end we ask you to take an active interest yourselves. When you strike some interesting operating room experience, or experience connected with management, set it forth briefly and plainly. Don't be afraid you can't write well enough for publication. I'll attend to that. That's what I'm here for. If you have some little kink that you think would be of benefit to your brother operator or brother manager (this is the Operators' and Managers' Column, though the printer man left off the "Manager" and we've never had it added) send it along, with sketch if necessary. I'll whip it into shape, if it needs it, and thus we will all be benefited.

Examinations.—New York City, N. Y., writes thusly: "I greatly enjoy the discussion of various subjects in the Column by brother operators. I would also like to hear the opinions of New York men concerning the recent examinations held by the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity to determine the qualifications of operators. Do you think it was a fair one—an examination where the operator received fair play? Did not some of you leave the examining room feeling in your heart and soul that you had not been given a square deal? I don't wish to dig up the dead and buried, nor be considered a pessimist, but I do think there was not justice done in those examinations. At the very least I claim it is but fair that a man be informed as to what he failed in. Why, there were men who were turned down because they failed on only one question? Do you call that fair play, Mr. Editor? In any sort of an examination a man must make a certain percentage in order to be eligible. But there a man is found incompetent because he happened to overlook some one thing that was not there. I'll leave it to you or to any one who has been there for examination if the examiners did not look like a bunch of cats with a mouse (operator) as their prey! I know for a fact that there are a number of old operators with five or more years' experience who have gone through this same ordeal. I should like to ask you, Mr. Richardson, if a man who has failed can demand to be informed as to what he failed on?"

I give this letter space because, while I have no manner of doubt but that its writer firmly believes all he sets forth by implication and assertion, it gives me the opportunty to say a few things that need saying. In the first place, to hitch the cart in front of the horse, the law places the whole matter of examination and licensing in the hands of the department and their decision is, as I understand it, final as to a man's qualification or lack of it. I believe the Board would inform, as a matter of proper courtesy, any man who made request in the right manner, of what he failed in; still I don't believe they could be forced to do so except by a lengthy and hazardous proceeding in court. But I have always been given to reasoning things out and applying the test of reason, I fail utterly to see why the analogy of cat and mouse holds good. Can New York give me any sensible reason why the Board should wish a man to fail? What earthly thing would they gain by causing his failure? Surely Mr. Sheridan and the other examiners are not ferocious monsters who inflict pain just for the fun of it! As a matter of fact, New York, it is quite possible for a man to fail, utterly, on one question. That is to say, it is possible that his answer to one question will preclude any possibility of his being competent. I personally stood in the examining room and listened to three old operators say they would not hitch up to a No. 0 or 00 wire because it was "too strong," while one replied to a question, "What is the rheostat for?" by saying it "was to regulate the heat"! That one question was enough, was it not? Did it need more to demonstrate his utter ignorance of even the fundamentals of electric current? And now, New York, I'm going to lose your good opinion right here, I guess, for I'm going to say that if I had my way about it the examinations would go very much further than they do. There would be less operators when I got through, but what there were would be the real thing. No, I don't think the Board is jobbing anyone. I can't see why they should! I will publish criticism of the Board's operations at any time, provided such criticism seems reasonable. Remember that I said criticism, however—not abuse.

There is one thing which Operators' Unions might well take up with local authorities and insist upon and that is the placing of a framed copy of local laws applying to projection matters in the operating room. It is absolutely unfair to expect an operator to comply with a lot of laws with which he has no adequate means of familiarizing himself. Take Chicago as an instance: I myself had considerable trouble in ascertaining what the laws really were. I venture to say that a man less well posted as to just how to proceed would have had a hard job to dig them up. It is neither justice, reason or the commonest kind of common sense to expect or require an operator to comply with a whole lot of laws without informing him, or at least making it reasonably easy for him to discover what the law is. Cities would be placed at but a trifling expense in having the laws applying to operating rooms printed on suitable cardboard, which the law should require to be framed and hung in the booth.

A Hard Proposition, Illinois (name and town suppressed), writes: "I wrote you just the other day for information and now must trouble you again. I trust you will not be angry. Referring to last communication: the only room we can get is 40 by 20 with an 11-foot ceiling. It would be out of the question to raise the floor at the rear to get a slope. If we project a 10 by 12 (life size) picture the bottom of it would be just one foot from the floor and how could those at the rear see it? I believe if we project an 8 by 12 those seated in the rear chairs could see all the picture. Don't you think so? Would 8 by 12 be too small? Can you tell us approximately how high machine must be from floor to project this size picture at 35 feet from the screen? We will probably use Ozo-Carbilight (oxygen and acetylene). Is this light reliable?"

In the first place, Illinois, a machine will not project an 8 by 12 picture, but an 8 by 10 (approximately) instead. The aperture is three-fourths of an inch by about fifteen-sixteenths of an inch and the picture will, of course, be in that exact relative proportion as to height and width. That is to say, the height will be to the width as three-fourths is to fifteen-sixteenths. This means that, supposing you propose magnifying your picture as it appears in the aperture of the machine 150 times. One hundred and fifty times three-fourths of an inch is 9 feet 4½ inches, about, while one hundred and fifty times fifteen-sixteenths of an inch is close to 11 feet 9 inches. You would therefore have a picture of those proportions and the proportions hold good at any magnification. If anyone wishes to figure the exact height of a picture of a given width let them reduce the width to inches and find how many times width of the aperture plate of their machine is contained into the number so obtained. Next multiply the exact height of the aperture by the number so obtained and divide by 12. The final result will be the picture height in feet and fractions of a foot. In measuring the aperture use a fine scale (rule) and inside callipers for accurate results. But I am digressing, Illinois. Eleven feet is very low ceiling height for a moving picture theater room, though it may be made do after a fashion. The main trouble will be that if you slope your floor it will necessitate the lens being up as close to the ceiling as possible. In the sketch it is located 18 inches from the ceiling. This, in turn, makes operating very awkward, though it may be managed. The machine being jammed right up against the ceiling of the operating room, the top of the peephole will only be as high as the top of the upper magazine. You will readily see what an awkward position the operator will be in relation to his machine. The really practical thing to do would be to cut the floor off at the point marked X in the elevation sketch and, after sawing the joist off along the wall, drop the floor as indicated by dotted lines. You could then throw a 10 by 12 picture and you need not locate the machine so high. You will find, however, that attempting to operate in a room with ceiling height such that you must have the bottom of the picture only 3 feet from the floor will prove exceedingly unsatisfactory, while the difficulty in building a slope on top of the floor is that when you have located the machine as high as the ceiling it will allow anyone arising from a seat in line with the light ray, will interfere, since the floor will be only 5 feet 6 inches from the light. The height of the machine has nothing to do with the size of picture it will project. It is the lens focus which determines that. Aside from the heads of persons entering or leaving interfering in the light there is no objection to building a slope on top of the floor. As to people seated on a flat floor seeing the bottom of a picture located three feet from it, that is out of the question. They simply couldn't do it, that is all. The aisle shown, particularly the steep slope, must be carpeted with coarse matting securely nailed down, to prevent slipping. Don't have steps leading up to the floor. Use a slope. Steps are dangerous in case of fire panic. As to the light named, it is "reliable" enough, what there is of it but there is not much of it. I believe you will find it highly unsatisfactory for moving pictures. Have any of our readers had experience with carbilight? If so kindly set it forth in a letter. As to The Column, neighbor, you are at liberty to use it as much as you like. That is what it is for!

Setting Shutter, Mauch Chunk, Pa., writes: "I have evolved the following rule for setting the shutter and it suits me better than any I have seen. It will work on the Edison, Powers No. 5, Standard and Lubin. Light the lamp, open the machine gate and throw white light on screen. Set cam pin so that it is entered just half its diameter into star slot. Move shutter on its spindle until it covers about three-fourths of the aperture, as shown by light on screen. Tighten shutter on its spindle and—there you are! Framer should be as nearly as possible in central position while setting shutter as above."

Excellent, Mauch Chunk. It is one of the several ways I have set forth in The Column on several occasions, but in addition you utilize the light on the screen to determine the shutter's exact position. I think someone else suggested the same thing some time since, if I'm not mistaken. Nevertheless that in no way detracts from your performance in discovering for yourself the scheme.

"DAISIES"—A VITAGRAPH PASTORAL.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

There was no false note in the settings of "Daisies" (Vitagraph Company). The exteriors were admirably chosen and the interiors are carefully woven into this genuine work of art. Even the flower-circled sub-titles contributed to the general arrangement of particulars. All the details of the play, from beginning to end, constitute an esthetically pleasing whole, a refreshing, gladdening picture, a view of nature in Springtime, sweetened and brightened by many groups of lovely women.

The general performance at the theater was a gray monotone until "Daisies" appeared. It came like a ray of sunshine into a Puritan meeting house, or like an exquisite, modern water-color among a lot of sombre old paintings dulled and cracked by time and tradition, for it seems impossible for most directors to separate themselves from dulled and cracked methods of presenting a picture story. Instead of dirty back-yards, shabby corner-stores or tumbledown shacks, we were treated to meadows of tender green enameled with a profusion of bright flowers, the interiors sustaining instead of marring the effect, the whole play being marked by a harmony of action and feeling.

I am inclined to think that a woman had something to do with the graceful movement and nice appropriateness of details in this play.

If I was a director, I would get a woman to put the finishing touch on home interiors. They know more about it. We men crow a great deal over our artistic achievements, most that we do on earth is to scratch gravel and crow about it, but all the restful beauty of home life is created by the goddess of the household. Even the humblest woman preserves order and cleanliness in her home. Those on a higher plane not only beautify their dwelling places with all the charms that taste and cultivation can suggest, but they are also responsible for much that is ornate in man's constructive work, inspiring or suggesting it. Woman is instinctively attracted by the expression of beauty in external things, but she is our ideal.

There is something the matter with a man who does not love women,—not only one but all of them.

"Daisies" is chuck full of 'em.

There seems to be a hundred pretty girls in the play, and that is one reason I liked it.

One lone man rambles around in this almost-Adamless-Eden, but he doesn't do much damage. He gets engaged to an ambitious girl, who wants to give her spiritual nature full play, wants to enjoy advanced methods of instruction at Vassar, realizing that the more comprehensive her knowledge the better care she can take of herself and her children. He was not interested in the question of race betterment, did not know that evolution from our present semi-barbarian condition does not depend upon how many children are born, but upon how well they are born and bred. He did not want his wife to be so highly educated that she could get the true measure of his intellectual pretensions. He wanted one who would laugh at his jokes, and more than once at the same joke, who could think of something she needed, anything from a kimono to a Paquin creation, and laugh harder, the laugh proportioned to the necessities of the occasion. I didn't care much for that fellow. He is one of the kind that comes home at night and tells his wife what a wonder he is and how little appreciated at the office. And then, if she relates something new she has accomplished at home, he says he thought of it first.

The heroine is a rural beauty, a veritable shepherdess with two little Boston terriers for sheep. In the pretty hammock scene these purps do their stunt with an activity and naturalness that puts to shame the artificial methods of theatrical managers.

The Vitagraph pastoral is full of shepherdesses-es-es.

They are not of the Watteau paintings nor of the Dresden china.

They are real girls, car-loads of 'em.

Some of them are just kissable girls from Brooklyn. Others are Vassar maidens in Dorian tunics, like that worn by Diana of Versailles. They were the real article, photographed at the famous Poughkeepsie college for women, and all the more interesting on that account. Some of those young ladies will be engaged later on, not only in making some male lives better worth the living, but in upsetting our greedy business methods and our grafty political system, possibly discussing the question whether men, having proven their incompetency to regulate matters for over two thousand years, should be allowed to vote. I almost shuddered as I watched the stately procession bearing the daisy chain. There is something prophetic in that chain.

To incorporate these sybils of to-day in a picture story was a bright idea. All credit to the originator of it. Everybody is interested in the coming woman. There is no reason why a woman of brains, who takes care of her health, should not make an exceptionally fine wife from a sympathetic and companionable point of view. Instead of being a bridge-whist-playing drag on a man's progress, a woman of finer organism and larger capabilities could stand shoulder to shoulder with men who are to improve our conditions of living.

I clearly remember the wondrous sybils in the Sistine chapel at Rome, not because Michael Angelo laid on his back to paint them in the lofty vault, but because of their prophetic majesty. I can not forget them any more than I can forget that Caesar conquered all Gaul. The latter valuable piece of information was licked into me, but the stately sybils lighted my imagination with a vestal fire. They were superior to men in those days, knew more than most men these days, and they seem to say, "We will revisit the earth some day, but you will not know us." They were from Persia, Libya and Greece. Ours are from Los Angeles, St. Paul and Bangor. Perhaps they are the same. They looked it. The kiss of Apollo on their lips, the shadow of the laurel on their brows, the immortality of genius in their bosoms, the long line of bright American girls added a sort of historical value to the production.

Well, the hero went up to see his discarded girl graduate, and, to astonish the natives of Poughkeepsie, he wore a silk hat. The girl shuddered when she saw him, probably on account of that incongruous hat; only actors and drummers wear silk hats in small towns, that's why they can't get their checks cashed, they look too much like the villain in the play. She bade him go back to the Rialto and tell what a big salary Belasco paid him. They met again, in the old trysting place, and the daisy chain encircled their hearts.

The pastoral was a simple story in beautiful setting.

Wichita, Kan.—Snodgrass & Mackey have almost completed a $20,000 moving picture palace, to be known as the Colonial. Up to date in every particular, a 12 x 14 mirror screen is part of the equipment. We will publish a detailed description and photographs of this magnificent house in an early number.

Fredonia, Kan.—The new Cunningham Theater, to be opened Sept. 1, will be the finest of its kind in this neighborhood. Wm. Cunningham, who also owns the Lyric and a third interest in the Airdome, is very popular with the Fredonians, who appreciate the kind of entertainment he provides. We will give a picture of the new theater when it is completed.

"BISON" COMPANY ADDS NEW EQUINE FEATURE.

On this page appears a striking photograph taken of Fred J. Balshofer, western manager and producer of the "Bison" films, mounted on "Snowball," the latest recruit to the stock company of the New York Motion Picture Company. The animal is a thoroughbred, and is said to possess almost human intelligence. The price paid for this horse mounts into high figures, but the "Bison" company, with its usual enterprise, did not hesitate in acquiring it. "Snowball" will be seen performing spectacular "stunts" in the western pictures produced by this firm. Charles O. Baumann, secretary and treasurer of the "Bison" Company, who is at present sojourning with the stock company in California, is enthusiastic over the four-footed actor, and predicts that moving picture audiences will worship the handsome animal.

ATLAS MOVES TO LARGER QUARTERS.

The Atlas Film Company have moved their general offices from 19 Union Square to 10 East Fifteenth street, where they will occupy the entire lower floors, the change being made to afford the new publicity and sales forces sufficient space to carry out their plans for a heavy Fall and Winter campaign. The work of fitting up the new executive offices is being rapidly pushed to completion and the Atlas Company intends to provide everything necessary for the comfort and convenience of visiting buyers and their friends. An exhibiting room is being installed in which the products of the Atlas studio may be seen at any time.

VITAGRAPH EXECUTIVE OFFICES MOVED TO FACTORY.

With the passing of the film exchange conducted for so many years by the Vitagraph Company and which has been bought by the General Film Company, the offices at 116 Nassau street have undergone some changes. For business reasons they will still be maintained, but the bookkeeping and executive departments have been moved to the factory in Flatbush. There a new three-story building is being rushed to completion which will house all the mechanical departments, and the other buildings will be used to accommodate the clerical and scenario forces.

There are now thirty members in the Vitagraph stock company of actors and actresses, besides seven directors, and it requires big space to keep them and the camera men in operation. With the accounting department also established at the factory in addition to the scenic and other departments, the Vitagraph village takes on an aspect of activity and prosperity that is an imposing tribute to the growth of the moving picture business.

MINER'S NEW THIRD AVENUE THEATER.

J. H. Hallberg, of 36 East Twenty-third street, New York City, has secured the order for the moving picture machine and electrical equipment of Miner's new theater, which occupies one-half a block on Third avenue near 156th street. This theater has a seating capacity of about 2,000 and is one of the handsomest in Greater New York. Regular plays will be produced as well as vaudeville and motion pictures. There will be installed two "Hallberg" spot lights with Economizers in the second balcony which are claimed to be the most powerful ever produced. The motion picture equipment will consist of Motiograph No. 1, 1910 model machines, and the "Hallberg" Automatic Electric Economizer will control the arc lamps. The stage pockets will also be equipped with "Hallberg" Automatic Electric Economizers, one for each spot light, of which eight will be required. The use of the Economizer on the spot light increases the brilliancy almost 100 per cent. over rheostat control, reducing the noise to the minimum on alternating current and saves between 60 to 70 per cent. on the current bill. There has also been installed an electric sign reading "Miner's" on both sides which will be controlled by an automatic flasher to light first one side, then the other, and so on. This sign is equipped with the "Hallberg" incandescent lighting system and there are two "Hallberg" Economizers, one for each side of the sign. This system is guaranteed to save two-thirds on the current bill for the illumination of the sign. This installation includes the most modern and up-to-date equipment in every detail and is in charge of Mr. Baker, chief electrician for the theater.

MIRROR SCREEN FOR BROOKLYN.

There is being erected at 1016 Fulton street, Brooklyn, near Irving avenue, a moving picture theater which will be a credit to the neighborhood and to the enterprising promoters, Haase & Schloh. Every modern appliance conducive to safety, comfort and efficiency is being installed, even to an 11 x 15 mirror screen. It is very gratifying to observe that men who are entering the exhibiting game now seem to realize that their only hope of success lies in their getting the best of everything. Such enterprise deserves and commands success.

By the way, Tuck & Manning, Gaiety Theater Building, the agents for the mirror screen in Greater New York, tell us that New York exhibitors have suddenly taken great interest in the screen and that since the installation of the one in the Varieties Theater, Third avenue and Fourteenth street, they have booked many orders.

Kinemacolor has had another successful demonstration—this time in Philadelphia. We understand that the factory in Allentown is now ready to take care of regular service.

POWER'S MACHINE STOLEN.

338 Spruce street, Philadelphia, August 12, 1910.
Moving Picture World.

Gentlemen—I beg to inform you that a person who answers to the name of J. S. Schinski, short of stature, smooth shaven, with a prominent nose, and giving his address as 512 South Fourth street, Philadelphia, called here on Friday, August 5, and received a No. 6 mechanism made by the Nicholas Power Company, New York City, serial No. 515, patent No. 2002. Part payment was made with a check for $120.00, which was returned by his bank, and subsequently I learn that he has drawn almost the entire amount from his bank and left Philadelphia for Chicago, Ill., on Saturday, August 6.

I will appreciate it if you will give this matter publicity through your journal.

Yours very truly,
LEWIS M. SWAAB.

SOUTHERN EXHIBITORS' ASSOCIATION.

Chattanooga, Tenn., August 15.

Sunday, August 14, Atlanta, Ga., was the scene of a largely attended meeting of motion picture exhibitors from four different Southern States. The outcome was the formation of "The Southern Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association," the object of which is protection, mutual benefit, to prevent undesirable competition, and secure better films on a more equitable rental basis. Great enthusiasm was evinced by those present. Officers were elected as follows: E. H. Davis, "Bijou," Griffin, Ga., prsident; H. C. Farley, "Empire," Montgomery, Ala., vice-president; Philip May, "Lyric," Charleston, S. C., second vice-president, and Wm. F. Niel, "Crescent," Chattanooga, Tenn., secretary and treasurer.

Hearing of the meeting, Arthur Lucas, of the Sunny South Film Company, tendered the exhibitors an invitation to dinner at Durand's, which was accepted. An eight-course dinner was thoroughly enjoyed. Interesting talks were made by several exhibitors.

It is expected that the new association will have a membership of 150 within a short time.

Pete Houpert, "Pastime," Birmingham, Ala.: "Montgomery," formerly of Memphis, now of Jacksonville, Fla., and Dan Holt, the owner of two large houses in Macon, were some of those who telegraphed their regrets but expressed their sympathy with the movement.

Yours truly,
WM. F. NIEL,
Secretary and Treasurer.

SCENARIOS AND THEIR WRITERS.

Lawrence, Kan., August 13, 1910.

To the Editor:

Dear Sir—Your general remarks about scenario writing and scenario writers might not suffer from some emendation, I believe. While I am not, in point of years and experience, able to size up the situation as you are, yet I make so bold as to affirm that the past few years of careful scrutiny have enabled me to gain a fair idea of where the motion picture status is "at" as regards present and future possibilities.

Your reference to me as an "ambitious" scenario writer or a "would-be" is rather inapt, inasmuch as I have no ambitions in that line. For a number of reasons I need not mention here, I essayed to find what sort of a proposition scenario writing was and what sort of men the various producers had for editors. I might mention here that I found out what I wished. You will remember that, in my letter to you, I stated that the scenarios I was submitting for your perusal were real, in other words, they were not products of a hack-writer's exhausted imagination. And there is just the point. Real, true-to-life and dyed-in-the-wool products. Mind you, actual, flesh and blood human beings took part in the plots that I submitted. Yet, however laughable it may seem to a thinking man, each and every one of the subjects was turned down as stale and lacking in originality. And Lux Graphicus added the same opinion. But perhaps Lux Graphicus overlooked the little statement to that effect in my letter.

I will have to frankly admit that, in a general way, the plots of the stories in question were somewhat old. Mais puis, what? Are the producers going to be able, in the future, to secure such a selective variety of subjects for elaboration that they will be able to turn up their noses at plots that have a substance and, perhaps, are the results of some distended and time worn creative genius? When we leave life, then we come to the possibilities. Of course the creative genius mentioned above would probably say, it could have happened. Granted, also granted that a goodly number of his creations have their parallels in actuality, but a goodly number have not. Is the public to be amused year in and year out by aimless and harmless possibilities? Will the public stand for it? Questions in dispute of which dramatists for hundreds of years have failed or have become immortal. Shakespeare would probably not be quite so immortal, perhaps, had he taken the creative path. A great deal of the profound interest of that poet's stories lies in the fact that they are based upon actualities. But this is only a point of illustration, which I hope the various producers will take note of.

I do not mean to infer that there is any room to speak of in the field of motion picture writing for immortality. I also appreciate the fact that the field of immortal plots and incidents in literature and history is not without bounds, but there is a large portion of the world's history that has not been "literatureized," if I may use such a term.

In taking plots from actual life, it is not so essential that your producer publish the fact that his subject was drawn from res vera. No, hardly that; all that would be necessary would be for the producer to have the inward satisfaction that he is not building on air continually. The argument that the moving picture has "come to stay" would also be strikingly strengthened when your maker can truthfully avow that he is picturing life as it is or was and not as it might have been or might be.

Yes, Lux Graphicus, it is reality that is the substance of life. And this pertains to the picture just as much as it does to every other thing in our daily existence. On the regular stage traffic in pointless imaginations and conjurations fail to hold the public interest. So the stage, in order to survive, was compelled to deal in actualities. In the drama it was a case of the survival of the fittest, the fittest proved to be reality. Your imaginative drama was ephemeral. And our imaginative picture is bound to share a like fate.

Of course a great number of the picture plays nowadays are somewhat true to life and deal with human problems, but you will have to admit, I believe, that a large part of them do not reach the core of life, so to speak. There are perhaps some four or five general plots that compose the picture story-drama of to-day. In such cases these plots are differently elaborated, but after the boiling process has been subjected, where is your "new" or "novel" plot? There is none. Therefore the hue and cry constantly raised by the scenario editor for something "novel" is in a fair way to be unanswered, so far as a revolution in the plot, per se, is concerned. Life and humanity are not new. Everyone will agree to that. Then will the picture maker have the effrontal to believe that he can get along without life? And that the public will stay by him? That is a much mooted question, I believe.

Nothing ever existed for very long a period without reality, excepting probably the nursery with its fairy tales and Mother Goose.

What is the matter with present day problem plays in the picture field? And another thing, why go on using the products of the hack-writer when the field of literature and history has practically not been "fazed" by the producers? Your reference to Byron, the other day, was very fitting. But Byron was one among many.

Modernity, at the present time, is being worked to death on the screen. Cowboys and Indians have become extremely disgusting, not only to the patron of aesthetic tastes, but also to the patron whose appreciation and desires reach a little higher than the "Indian" and the "cowboy" cavorting over the Jersey hills. Mind you, the moving picture public has, in a way, become educated up to a point where it will not stand for ever-ending rehash of stale junk. At least that appears to be the situation here in the West and I take it that it is not wholly inapplicable to the East.

If you have space for these remarks in The World, I should like to see them published, since I believe a large part of your readers will concur with my "sintiments."

I hope you will pardon me for intruding on so much of your time. There is a great deal more I would like to say on the above subject, but I know your space is limited. I am

Sincerely yours,
NELSON T. STEPHENS.

[The remarks of "Lux Graphicus" were intended to have a general and not a particular application. We shall shortly be referring to the subject editorially.—Ed.]

THE SORROWS OF THE UNFAITHFUL

Fickleness that Induces Woe and Disaster

This Biograph film story shows the woe and calamity that may be induced by a fickle, whimsical woman. Mary and Bill were sweethearts from childhood until the day that Bill rescued Joe, a stranger, from the sea. Mary is at once attracted by Joe and breaks her troth with Bill. Joe, however, realizing that he owes his life to Bill, repulses Mary and would have left the place for good. Bill does not know the stranger's feeling in the matter, and wreaks a terrible vengeance only to learn too late of his supposed rival's real character and his determination. The subject comprises a series of most beautiful sea coast and fishing village scenes.

WILFUL PEGGY

A Comedy of the Early Days in Ireland

A most delightful romantic comedy of the early days in Ireland is presented in this Biograph film. It shows the true Irish traits of candor and truth. Peggy, though a peasant girl, is self-willed and afraid of no one. Her spunky, pugnacious nature, which tends to emphasize her beauty, impresses the lord of the manor to the extent of proposing marriage. The marriage takes place and after a tumultuous honeymoon, he finds he is in possession of a rare jewel of womankind.

WILFUL PEGGY.—There is in the Irish the most commendable of traits, candor. They are truthful in the extreme, and hence pugnacious, for he who has the courage of his convictions must have grit to back it up. This is even so with the fair lasses of the Emerald Isle, for they scorn the art of dissembling, and pretty little Peggy is an example. It was in the early days of this land of poetry and romance, that the lord of the manor started out for a stroll. Proceeding quite a distance, it being one of those warm days upon which everyone and everything even vegetation suffered indolence, there being not a breath of air stirring, he was overcome with fatigue and thirst. Approaching the home of Peggy, he finds her napping on the stoop. Arousing her, he commands her to bring him a drink. Commands, mind you. Well this is surely rubbing Peggy the wrong way. At first she positively refuses to budge, and he then becomes more suppliant and begs her to please favor him with a drink, so she condescends. The lord is deeply impressed by the artless wilful colleen, and resolves to pay her another visit. At the time of his next call he sees her vanquish a forward admirer who became so bold as to try to kiss her. This indiscreet lad is glad to get out of her reach with nothing more than a few bumps on the head. The lord witnesses the scrimmage from a distance, and reasoning the time inopportune leaves deeply infatuated with this rough diamond. When next he calls it is to propose marriage. Whee! how Peggy does storm at his proposition until finally induced by her mother to accept this honor. They are married immediately and Peggy meets for the first time the lord's nephew, a handsome, though conceited chap who at once imagines he has made an impression upon the peasant bride. During the lawn party which followed the wedding, Peggy finds court manners and etiquette a bit intricate and while returning the courtesy of some of the ladies, trips over her train and goes sprawling. This is viewed with ill concealed amusement, and Peggy flying into a rage would annihilate the whole party. Rushing into the mansion, she sends the servants flying out of her way. The nephew now appears and attempts to console her. He does this by proposing a horseback ride, but she has no riding costume, and when the nephew suggests her wearing a suit of his, in the spirit of deviltry she consents and rides with him to the inn. The lord, heart-crushed, follows on vengeance bent. However, when he arrives he finds Peggy about to brain the nephew with a stool for daring to attempt to kiss her. One glance at the scene, and the lord realizes she can well take care of herself, for there is his nephew crouched under the table, and Peggy with upraised stool daring him to come out. The lord at once mounts his horse, and by a short cut arrives home much ahead of Peggy, who, upon her arrival, shows abject contrition, for she really loves the lord.

THE SORROWS OF THE UNFAITHFUL.—Oh! deliver us from the fickle woman. No person can spread such woe, disaster and sorrow even unto their ownselves as such an one; and such an one is the leading character of this Biograph subject. In a quaint fishing village we see the childhood sweethearts, Bill and Mary, a boy and girl of about ten or eleven years. Constant companions, they hold for each other a regard beyond their understanding. Ten years roll by, and the boy, now a young man, with a ring approaches the girl and the sweethearts of childhood now renew their vows. They are both very happy until fate interferes, it seems, to test the girl's sincerity. Bill while strolling on the shore, which to him since the betrothal is a Utopia, espies a raft with an object on it that looks like a human being, far out at sea. Dashing into the surf, he swims to the raft and finds the almost exhausted form of a fisherman lying prone upon it. Pushing the raft to the shore, he, with the aid of others, revives the man, who is a stranger to them all, having put out from a far distant shore. Bill and Joe, the stranger, become staunch friends, and through this Joe meets Mary. She is at once smitten with the stranger and cruelly casts Bill aside for him. Joe, of course, knowing nothing of Bill's love for Mary, reciprocates her affection until he learns the truth. The horror of the situation is vivid. Here he finds himself the successful rival of the man to whom he owes his life. No, it cannot be, and so repulsing the impetuous Mary he rushes from the place, but not before Bill has seen enough to make him believe Joe has proved himself an ingrate. Joe makes a strenuous effort to reject Mary's advances, but she is persistent. Finally managing to elude her, he sends her the following note: "Mary—Bill saved my life. I will not rob him of his love. I see the raft on the shore. I shall go back to the sea on it. If the sea claims me it is my fate. Joe." She is amazed at this and rushes madly to the shore in view of staying his determination. In the meantime, Bill overtakes Joe at the shore, and ignorant of his purpose, with a blow sends him into the sea, never to return. At this moment Mary rushes up, she, of course, not aware of Joe's fate and shows Bill the note. He is driven mad upon learning that his deed was entirely unnecessary, so bidding Mary to wait, he wanders out, out into the sea with an insane idea of recovering his victim.

HIS NEW FAMILY. Michel Lafayette, a school teacher in one of the little seacoast towns in France, concludes to go to America to better provide for the maintenance of his wife and eleven-year-old boy. He leaves after bidding farewell to all his neighbors and his scholars and lastly to his devoted wife and son, whom he leaves to the care and protection of the cure of the village.

A year after his arrival in America his wife dies in France. The good old cure, thinking it best for father and son, sends little Jean by express to his father at Holcomb, Arizona, in the United States.

At about the time Jean leaves France, Michel Lafayette, his father, is killed in a mining accident.

Big-hearted Andy Kendal, a typical old pioneer, makes up his mind to adopt Jean. We see Andy bring the boy to his cabin and establish him in his new home. The only children in the camp are the little boy and baby girl of Jack Smith, a ruffianly character. Jean becomes attached to the little ones and seeks frequent opportunities of playing with them. This annoys Smith, who orders the French boy away.

One day Smith is walking near the edge of a mountain stream and is roughly dragging his little boy along. Jean comes along and remonstrates with him. Smith becomes very angry and makes a quick movement to strike Jean. Jean ducks the blow, which carries with it so great momentum that Smith misses his footing, goes over the bank into the stream below and is drowned.

Jean takes the little ones by the hand and brings them to the cabin of Andy Kendal. Andy returns to his cabin a couple of hours later and is astonished to find that the family is increased by two. The question now is, what is he going to do? Thinking the thing over for a moment, he comes to a military salute and bows his head, fully convincing the observer that he has concluded to abide by the action of little Jean.

HOW THE SQUIRE WAS CAPTURED.—This comedy starts in church, where we see a country squire trying to flirt with a pretty girl across the aisle. The said pretty girl, being full of ideas (perhaps somewhat induced by the young man behind her who whispers in her ear), intimates to her maiden aunt beside her that the squire's sheep's eyes are being cast at her (the aunt). Strange to say, the old lady is not so much displeased as one might expect, but smiles rather demurely and almost coquettishly.

Then there comes a note from the same squire, addressed to Miss Cora Lee, the pretty girl aforesaid. She shows it to the young man, likewise aforesaid, and they laugh at the idea of the squire addressing her. Again the girl has an idea and changes "Cora" so that it looks like "Cordelia," which is the maiden aunt's name, consequently the letter finds its way into the hands of the older lady, who at once responds by giving the squire an invitation to call. When he does call and tea is served in the garden he finds that he is being entertained by the aunt. Of course he is terribly disappointed, for try as he will he is unable to leave the elderly maiden's side for one little minute, but he makes the most of a bad bargain and adapts himself as best he can to the situation.

After this experience he can take no chances, so he sends a pretty red shawl to the young girl with the message that he hopes she will wear it that evening in the garden. The plan in which the letter was concerned having worked so well, the girl presents the shawl to the aunt and tells her that it is from the squire also. Of course auntie is much pleased, and is only too happy to agree to the squire's condition and wear the shawl in the garden.

The squire is not long in coming. He approaches softly and speaks in a low tone to the figure within the Summer house and sees an affirmative nod of her head. Then the squire, mustering all the courage that is in him, proposes to the lady wearing his gift, and is gently and sweetly allowed to take her hand in acceptance of his offer.

And then comes the denouement. The squire, clasping in his arms the unresisting form of his now affianced wife and gently raising her head to his that he may seal the betrothal with a kiss, discovers to whom he has proposed and by whom he has been accepted. He starts back in amazement, but at that instant there is a soft laugh behind him and, being a wise old man, he understands what has happened. The young people come down from the tree and, approaching, hold out their hands in earnest congratulations. And the squire, being a real sport even though he is a country squire, says to himself, "It is not such a bad bargain, after all, and I will refuse to let these two young scapegraces have the laugh on me." Consequently he takes the extended hands and shakes them warmly, responding gallantly to the proffered congratulations.

And then there is a quaint little touch of heart interest, for the young girl asks auntie if she may save the youth at her side, and auntie, out of the goodness of her heart and willing to share her responsibilities with her new found lord and master, asks him for his consent to the marriage of the young people. He looks at the pretty girl, swallows hard and gives the desired consent.

BUMPTIOUS TAKES UP AUTOMOBILING. Of course, it would be foreign to Bumptious to admit that there was anything about an automobile that he did not know, and he scornfully refuses the instruction offered when the machine is delivered to him, dismissing the demonstrator in the curtest manner possible. For some reason the machine does not start off promptly when he takes his seat and does what he thinks ought to produce immediate results. Then he remembers that he has forgotten to crank the engine, this enlightenment coming from the book of instructions which he condescends to look over. The cranking is not so easy as it looks, and results in his getting a "kick back" and a bad fall.

After various experiences of this kind his friends become distrustful and refuse to ride with him. Whereupon he intimates that he will show them what a "joy ride" looks like. For some unaccountable reason the machine starts off promptly this time, but it has only gone a few feet when it takes a backward jump, and the last we see of it it is speeding away backward up the road, to the amazement of his friends.

The scenes that follow show the exciting experiences which Mr. Bumptious gives himself in the machine, which in spite of all his efforts continues to run backward with lightning speed up hill, down dale and across the country.

Bumptious, full of scorn for his much despised auto, offers to make a trade with a farmer, a donkey for the machine. When the latter is convinced that Bumptious is not crazy he at once accepts the offer and takes his seat in the machine. And then to Bumptious' horror and surprise the machine starts off exactly as it should, and the farmer rides off in the distance with perfect ease and contentment, leaving Bumptious standing in the middle of the road holding the bridle of his newly acquired donkey!

We next see his arrival at home, an arrival which does not compare favorably with his departure and which causes his friends much merriment.

LOVE AND THE LAW.—A drama adapted from a portion of "David Copperfield," by Charles Dickens. The love story of David and Agnes Wickfield, the daughter of the old lawyer over whom Uriah Heep holds an influence, is the theme involved in this picture. The delightful character of Betsy Trotwood is a prominent one, and also our old friend Wilkins Micawber. Wickfield and Heep, the two lawyers, are shown after Uriah becomes a partner of Mr. Wickfield. David is brought by Miss Trotwood, his aunt, and introduced to Mr. Wickfield, her attorney, who agrees to accept David as a student in his office.

At the time of the introduction Agnes Wickfield is on the scene, and there is a very pretty mutual attraction between the young people. Miss Trotwood surprises David by presenting him with two thousand pounds in Bank of England notes so that in the pursuit of his studies he will have ample funds to carry him along. As the story progresses we see that Uriah Heep, the oily hypocrite of Dickens' story, is very much in love with Agnes Wickfield. His method of love-making, however, is very disagreeable to Agnes for two reasons—first, she dislikes the man and his manner, and second, we see that she is gradually falling in love with the handsome young student in her father's office.

Uriah Heep, in order to get the upper hand of the situation, suggests to Mr. Wickfield, who is a man of weak character, that he hypothecate some securities belonging to Betsy Trotwood in order to relieve his (Wickfield's) financial embarrassment. Mr. Wickfield abstracts the securities from the strong box of Miss Trotwood and borrows money on them at a bond broker's. Wilkins Micawber discovers the fact that Mr. Wickfield is there borrowing money—on what, however, he does not know; but later developments make Micawber a saving element in this story.

In order to force Agnes to consent to his suit Uriah Heep tells her that he has the power to ruin her father. Just as the scene has reached its dramatic height David enters the room and Uriah cringingly retires. Agnes makes a confident of David and tells him the great trouble that is racking her heart. David bids her to have courage, and he proceeds to try to help her father out of the ugly situation. Micawber arrives at the conclusion that Mr. Wickfield disposed of the securities on the day he saw him in the bond broker's. Telling David what he believes, the two men leave for the bond broker's.

While David and Micawber are in the bond broker's office Betsy Trotwood calls on the Wickfields. Miss Agnes brings her into the office, and while Miss Trotwood is awaiting the coming of Mr. Wickfield, Uriah Heep greets her. We see by Uriah's actions in this scene and in many others where we have watched his hypocritical machination that he is in high glee. Mr. Wickfield is brought in by Agnes, who is in a tremulous state of mind lest anything be said of the bonds. Miss Trotwood begins to speak of financial investment, and is evidently going to ask Mr. Wickfield for her

The Man Who Learned

A Story of the Milk Supply of a Great City Produced in Co-operation with The New York Milk Committee securities, whereupon Heep steps over to Agnes and tells her that she must give him her answer to his proposal.

An intensely dramatic and interesting story showing the contrasting methods of preparing and distributing milk for great cities. The so-called "old fashioned way" now considered most unsanitary starts the picture, and also the story in which the favorite grandson of a farmer, who refuses to adopt new and sanitary methods, becomes ill by impure milk from his grandfather's farm. The child recovers, however, and the old farmer changes the methods and conditions on his farm with a happy ending for the family.

At this critical juncture David enters the room, accompanied by Mr. Crawley. Just as Miss Trotwood asks for the bonds and Heep expects the great haul he has prepared to burst, David calmly steps forward with the strong box in which he has placed the securities after having refunded the money to the bond broker. This is the big dramatic situation of the picture. Heep shows himself now in his true colors, and after Miss Trotwood has left the room and David and Agnes are in conversation he gives vent to all the vituperation in his nature. He is cowed, however, by David's manly attitude and leaves the room. It is now Agnes' turn to thank David for the great kindness which he has done her. We witness a very pretty finale to the picture, which ends, as all love stories should, happily for the two young people.

THE VALET'S VINDICATION.—The action begins in the apartment of Howard Beeckman, a young society bachelor. He leaves his handsome apartment in the charge of Kirby, his valet, and enjoins upon the said Kirby the strictest good behavior during his month's absence. The scene ends by showing how Kirby intends to observe this injunction. He goes to the telephone and apparently sends an invitation to some of his pals.

Then the scene shifts to a handsome suite at the Waldorf where Mr. and Mrs. Bradley and their pretty daughter are stopping, and from which place they are writing an advertisement for an apartment such as they want.

And then we travel to the morning after Kirby's party. Kirby discovers that he is without money, the game of the night before having taken all of his wages. In the midst of his quandary as to what to do his eye lights upon the advertisement of the Bradleys, and he resolves to answer it and rent them his master's apartment. The plan succeeds. Then Kirby disappears with the advance rental in his pocket and goes out to "see the town." But Beeckman unexpectedly returns in the middle of the night soon after the Bradleys are settled, and is confronted by "Papa" Bradley and other members of the family en deshabille. After explanations have been made Beeckman's eye lights upon the pretty daughter. The sight of her arouses all the chivalry in his New York nature, and he promptly offers to take himself off and leave them in possession of his apartment. But he does not stay away, evidently, for we see him a few days later at the piano with the girl; and something in the way they behave and look at each other suggests that a love story is in progress.

Kirby returns and is sardonic, as he has been an unsuspecting Cupid. There is a little epilogue scene which shows their first home breakfast together and Kirby as a sort of guardian angel of the household.

ESSANAY FILM MFG. CO.

TAKE ME OUT TO THE BALL GAME.—Our friend Blink is a baseball fan and a devotee of the sport. One day he finds he will have time in the afternoon to visit the ball park, and from that moment until noon he is in an excited fever, refusing to talk anything but baseball to the business men who call on him. When the clock strikes twelve Blink seizes his hat, slams down his desk and tells his stenographer that he is gone for the day.

Blink hurries home and gets his wife busy with the dinner. She is curious to know why he is in such a hurry and finally, between bites, he tells her he is going to the ball game. Fanny expresses her desire to go, also, and insists on her husband waiting for her to dress.

Minutes crawl by like hours to Blink as his wife arrays herself for the game, and when she finally appears, leading Jack, the bull pup, he seizes her by the arm and drags her out of the house.

They board a car, but the conductor objects to the dog. Fanny pushes the conductor into a corner, and Jack makes short work of the seat hogs.

However, the ball park is reached at last, and Blink goes to get the tickets. When he comes back with the necessary paper he is in such a hurry and so happily excited as to grab the arm of another woman, a large, fat, colored "mammy," and does not discover his mistake until they are inside.

Now he has to buy another ticket, and after he has located Fanny and the dog they hurry into the gate and to the bleachers.

The game is an exciting one, but not for Fanny. She sees nothing in it at all, and finally dozes off to sleep with her head resting on a fat man's shoulder. Jack, the pup, becomes excited or angered at a rather shady decision by the umpire, and freeing himself from his chain erases the luckless referee all over the diamond.

The home team wins, of course, which makes Blink so happy that he goes off, forgetting Fanny. He follows the band of players on their triumphal procession downtown, and arrives at his home before he thinks of his missing spouse.

In the meantime, Fanny has slept peacefully through the game, and is deserted by her fat man. She is finally the only one left in the bleachers, but is soon awakened by a ball park guard.

She meets Blink half way home and there is the usual family row, which ends peacefully however, at the close of the film.

THE DEPUTY'S LOVE. Bob Dean, the deputy sheriff of Tonopan County, has fallen in love with Nance O'Brien, a bewitching little Western maid whose brother, as he supposes, works a claim on a neighboring hillside.

Previous to a love scene between the sheriff and the maid a strange incident has happened which will arouse a suspicious thought in our minds as to whether or not Nance is as innocent of evildoing as her frank face and guileless eyes would suggest. In the first place, Nance, dressed in her brother's clothes, and Walt, her brother, ride up to their house, dismount and enter. Nance is seen for a brief moment removing her masculine make-up, which reveals her identity as a very beautiful Western girl.

Later Bob Dean rides up, and after a love scene with Nance, presents her with a pair of riding gloves. Finally he kisses her and rides away.

Next we are shown Nance and her brother preparing for another mysterious journey. Nance again dons the man's clothes and both ride cautiously away.

In a lonesome place on the mountain trail they pull up their horses and listen. Down the canyon is heard the rumbling approach of the mail stage coach. A moment later the two are in ambush with their horses pulled well out of sight. A few moments pass and the coach, with the driver flipping his whip, comes into view.

The holdup is successful, as all the occupants are taken unaware, and scrambling out at the robbers' commands are relieved of their jewelry. A strong box, suggestive of a quantity of bullion, is also removed and the driver is ordered to go on.

Further down the road the excited crowd of tourists insist on the driver cutting loose one of the lead horses and sending for help, and some time later Dean, the deputy, is notified of the robbery.

A posse is organized and the trail of the escaping duo is found. Nance and her brother hear the sound of the hurrying hoofs and decide to separate, and thus throw the party off their trail.

The girl arrives home, having safely eluded pursuit, but her brother is not so lucky. Dean traces him to the door of the stable, enters and covers the man with his gun. It is then that Dean obtains evidence of Nance's guilt when he finds the suit of men's clothes and the gloves with which he had presented her.

Desiring to test her further, Dean covertly empties the shells from his revolver and replacing it in his holster drags O'Brien into the house where Nance is waiting for her brother to return. The incident that follows is highly dramatic. Nance wrests Dean's pistol from his belt, aims it at him and pulls the trigger. It is empty, of course, and Dean, seizing his former sweetheart's wrist, looks her to her brother and leads them out.

REFUSING A MANSION.—Once Upon a Time There Was a Prince. Under this subtitle we are brought into the beautiful little seaside kingdom over which the good and handsome prince holds sway. We are just remarking upon the tastefulness of his palace and grounds when he appears upon the drawbridge with his squire. With them we journey along a well-kept road by the sea until, on a point of rocks, we see a fair damsel washing garments and note the prince is interested. He goes to her and we learn that he is in love with the peasant girl. Because of his wealth she rejects him. We are forced to return to the palace, where with the help of many vassals, to please her the prince dresses as a peasant.

Now on his return she listens to him, his honeyed words soon win her heart, ere long he coaxes her within the walled town in which his palace stands. Expecting to give his choice great pleasure, he reveals himself, but is surprised to learn she is even more angry than upon their first meeting. She forthwith leaves him and his court.

The poor maiden consoles herself with the thought: "If he deceived me before we were wed, what would he have done later."

BUYING A MOTHER-IN-LAW.—The endeavors of a lover to get near the object of his affections are humorously shown. Owing to his very weak financial position he is not allowed the privilege of calling, and he is first of all seen entering the house in the garb of a lady to answer an advertisement for a music teacher. Once in, he allows his impetuosity to run away with him, with the result that he very quickly finds himself out again. However, he is not yet defeated, and devises other means of entrance, but with the same result, till a kindly relative, dying and leaving him a trifle of the great necessity of life, all doors are opened to the progressive young lover.

PARIS, VIEWED FROM THE EIFFEL TOWER.—An absolutely novel subject in which are presented superb bird's-eye panoramas of Paris and its suburbs, from the platforms and summit of the Eiffel Tower. The principal buildings, parks and thoroughfares stand out with wonderful distinctness and the Seine is pictured at great length as it winds its serpent-like course through the city. Marvelous views of the iron tower are [illegible]

THE ROMANY WIFE. The romance of a gypsy life offers one of the most alluring themes to the moving picture operator, and the Kalem people have been particularly successful in the portrayals of the Romany type. The latest release to be [illegible] is called "The Romany Wife" and was produced by the Kalem people while in the [illegible] of a genuine gypsy band. The story [illegible] loved by a gypsy girl is shown in the opening [illegible] of an old father's caravan in which one of the favorite members. However the young gypsy [illegible] her suitors and plead their cause [illegible]. The girl thanks the [illegible] of the [illegible] but when a chance meeting [illegible] to friendship of a stalwart young farmer [illegible] to love with him and [illegible] the [illegible] of the tribe, marries him and [illegible], [illegible] that the pleasure married life [illegible] held in store for her is far different from the roving life of the gypsies and after the [illegible] of the first [illegible] the longing for the old life [illegible] and see leaves him, taking the little [illegible] and returns to her father's tribe. There her former suitors renew their attentions and it looks as if the gypsy girl had altogether forgotten her own husband but the husband wanders [illegible] wife and [illegible] back again and starts at a [illegible] second and gladly locates the tribe and [illegible] the traitor realizes how great his love is and [illegible] and her child she once more turns her back on the gypsy life and goes back home with her husband.

"The Romany Wife" is notable for its picturesque and scenic embellishments and as it is a story romance with none of the sensational [illegible] features which usually characterize gypsy pictures will doubtless find great favor with [illegible].

THE CANADIAN MOONSHINERS. [illegible] The Kalem Club [illegible] another French Canadian story [illegible] to the Kalem Company "The Canadian Moonshiners." The title of this [illegible] a little misleading and is questionable [illegible] makers of illicit whiskey in Canada are not known as moonshiners. However, the term is generally understood that it [illegible] the best that could be used under the circumstances. The Kalem artists have endeavored to show the great damage to the primitive Indians by the illicit traffic in whiskey. The selling of which to the aborigines is prohibited by the laws of both the United States and Canada. In this subject we are shown how a moonshiner came under the [illegible] of the Canadian Mounted Police. The [illegible] daughter attempted to save her father from his [illegible] deserved fate and how the mounted police finally rounded up and captured the moonshiners.

The story is full of [illegible] and [illegible] of beautiful photographic quality.

HER WINNING WAY. Anxious to escape the strain of business and seek diversion and recreation Robert asks his father to give him a vacation for a few days' rest. The father who is absorbed by his business affairs [illegible] of the old school plodders, reluctantly grants the son's request and the young man hurries from the office, packs his grip and hustles for the train. On his way he makes the acquaintance of a very charming lady, who is bound for the same place as himself. Arriving at their destination he offers to carry her grip and she accepts his proffered kindness. Loaded down he follows her to the hotel where he gladly deposits the luggage to escape a complete collapse from exhaustion. He finds his "acquaintance" very winsome and attractive. So infatuated is he with her he prolongs his stay from one day to another until his father is obliged to send a clerk after him to bring him back. When the clerk arrives the lovelorn he finds the son head over heels in love with his "acquaintance" and seems willing to leave his home for her. The clerk is introduced to the young woman and he falls to her charms as readily as Robert did. The scheming creature drops the son and takes up with the clerk. The clerk succeeds in getting Robert to go back to the city pretending he will go with him. At the last moment the clerk refuses to go and hastens back to the adored one. The son returns to business and the father asks him where the clerk is. When he is informed the old man [illegible] and immediately dismisses another clerk after the first one. The second [illegible] has the same [illegible] as the first and the same result the girl gets them all. The boss in despair determines to go himself and [illegible] being. He gets a worse [illegible] and the climax is her devoted slave calls [illegible] and gets [illegible] for her.

COWBOY CHIVALRY.—Percy Condon announces his intention of visiting his old chum, Ernest Langdon, at the latter's ranch. Percy was the weight-lifting champion in his college days and Langdon tells the cowmen that there will be some fun. Percy comes and creates an impression at the start by lifting from the rig the trunk that taxes the strength of two of the punchers. The trunk contains dumbbells and other training apparatus and it is not long before Percy puts on the gloves with the boys. Joe Haines, the foreman, makes but a poor showing as a boxer, and Rita, Langdon's sister, is attracted by Percy's skill and rather inclined to forget that there was a pretty good understanding between herself and Joe. She and Percy ride the range together and he is fast winning her love. But the Indians are out and Joe discovers them. He rides back to Rita and Percy. Indian fighting differs from weight lifting and boxing and in a panic of terror Percy mounts his horse and rides off, leaving Rita with her lame mare. Joe mounts her on his own pony and forces her to ride after Percy. He makes his way to where they have entrenched themselves behind some rocks, and here Percy still further shows the white feather by refusing to go for water when the canteen is found to be empty. Joe gets the water for Rita, but is wounded as he does so. The sound of shots bring Langford and his men to the relief and at the last Percy redeems himself. The story abounds in thrills and is splendidly played.

THE ANARCHISTIC GRIP.—It's a simple start to a whole lot of trouble. A clock salesman sets out from the store with his stock in a bag. A tramp steals the goods while the salesman is waiting for a car and makes off with his plunder. He is tickled at the thought of winning a prize, but the ticking of the clocks suggests the workings of an infernal machine and the tramp is so scared that he almost is willing to go to work. He enlists the aid of a police officer and the latter decides to arrest the bag and take it to the station house. It does not take long for the story to get around and soon there is a crowd following, enjoying the thrills that come with the thought that any moment something may happen that will leave only a large hole as a souvenir of their late residence on earth. At the station house the sergeant is no more willing to welcome the terrible instrument of destruction and advises the policeman to take it out in the back yard and open it to see what it contains. The policeman has a large family and a sick wife dependent upon him and he points out these facts with much earnestness. Of course there is the police pension fund, but that will not help the policeman himself much, and there might have been charges of insubordination had not the salesman called to report the theft of his bag.

THE DREAM PILL.—Professor Swank has at last succeeded in crowning his career as an inventor by giving to the world a dream pill that will prove a positive antidote to nightmares. Having made the pills, the next thing is to find someone to try them on, and Swank's friends are not willing. They've been the goat on other inventions and they fight shy of new preparations. The advent of a tramp who wants something to eat solves the problem, and Swank offers him a five spot to be the pioneer dream pillist. The tramp is almost afraid to tackle the pills, but Swank raises the ante and the tramp decides that it is better to die rich than to starve to death. He takes the pill and in a flash there is a bountifully spread table before him and when his appetite has been satisfied he finds that he is wearing good clothes. Lighting a cigar he starts in to see the town and almost immediately is captured by a most attractive young woman who invites him for an automobile ride. They go to a restaurant, where the tramp finds that he is good for another meal, and makes the interesting discovers that he has a pocket full of money. He finds a damsel even more to his liking and he promptly makes a switch, discovering the new charmer to be a queen. She elects him king and he is about to claim his first kiss after the wedding ceremony when the pill's power fades and he wakes up. A spirited half reel story with many funny trick effects.

PATHE FRERES.

A MISCALCULATION.—An eminent astronomer pursuing his studies of Halley's comet, after rapid calculations, comes to the conclusion that it is impossible for this universe to escape destruction, and that the 18th of May is the date when the end will come. Philosophically resigning himself to fate, he apprises his friends of the coming catastrophe, and suggests that they all join with him in making merry on their last day on earth. They all agree and after a round of gaiety await in the professor's observatory the end with that wonderful calmness which is closely affiliated with Dutch courage. The rising of the sun on the 19th, however, dispels not only all fears, but also all confidence in the professor's powers of prediction, and his friends fall upon him and belabor him with blows for having induced them to neglect their businesses and spend their money.

THE TROUBLES OF A POLICEMAN. Clancy was a policeman and he always thought that his berth in the police station was one of the softest things an Irishman ever had, until he ran up against the Mulligan boys. These Mulligans numbered several and were a terror to the neighborhood in many ways, and when the territory in which they lived got too warm to hold them, they wandered off on Clancy's beat and played craps on the street in the vacant lots.

One fine Spring morning, Clancy spied the aforementioned tribe of Mulligans gleefully losing their mother's hard earned pennies in a game of craps. Clancy is wild with righteous indignation and succeeds in administering a hearty reproof in the way of a paternal drubbing with his club on that part of the boys' anatomy built for it. The boys swear revenge, and Patrolman Clancy suffers a series of hardships at the hand of these youngsters such as never before befell a simple-minded, kind-hearted policeman.

In the course of his difficulties he runs across Mrs. Mulligan with terrible results. He dives into the noble Hudson to rescue a drowning lad, only finding that the youngster can swim better than he can and gets out first.

THE LOVERS' WELL.—Theodore, a private soldier, is using his furlough to press his suit with Sadie, and in the opening scene, as they bid farewell, she gives him a daisy which he places in his pocketbook. The next day Sadie while reading comes across this verse:

"If a maid would her future husband see,
On Hallowe'en night, between twelve and three
She should go alone if the moon is bright,
And look down in the well on Condon's Heights."

Sadie that evening goes to the well. Bending over, she sees the reflection of Theodore's face, as he has followed her unawares. Delighted to find that he is to be her future husband, she opens the volume and they refer to the poem together. Duty calls him back, however, to his regiment, and a year has elapsed during which he has been promoted to sergeant. He has also fallen madly in love with a flashily dressed girl, who urges him to buy jewelry for her, and who, when he pleads poverty, suggests that he use the regimental funds for that purpose. Left alone in the commander's office one day with the safe unlocked, he is tempted, and is about to help himself to the money, when two of his chums enter and persuade him to replace the money and point out to him that he is only the dupe of this girl. Returning to his room he finds the dried daisy in his pocket, which recalls old memories, and he sees a vision of Sadie and himself at the well. Thinking things over, he sees what a fool he has been and determines to go and ask her pardon for his neglect and foolishness. He finds her looking into the well again with the poem in her hand and she is delighted to see again the reflection of his face in the water. Turning towards him it takes but a few minutes for the young couple to explain and forgive.

THE CASTAWAY'S RETURN.—A shipwrecked man is sighted and rescued from a barren island by the crew of a small vessel. His appearance is wild, his clothes in rags, and he is apparently demented, inasmuch as he does not appear able to talk or understand. From a broken spar found with him it appears that he comes from the same village as his rescuers, and on their return the sailors summon one of the old inhabitants in the hope that he may recognize the waif. He does recognize him as his son-in-law who had been missing very many years, and the man's wife is summoned, and she tries to bring memory back to her husband. It is without avail, the man's mind is a blank. At last she conceives the idea of arranging their home as it was in the old days. A little chap helps by taking his place on the mariner's knee and it is this that makes the experiment successful. The floodgates of memory are opened, and in a last and very effective scene, the mariner clasps his wife in his arms, whilst the rough sailors and villagers look on delightedly through the open door.

HOW JACK WON HIS BRIDE.—Jack is desperately in love with Irene, but her parents have determined that she shall marry a man of position and wealth. The disconsolate Jack is thinking over matters, when he comes across an advertisement of a quack offering to change the color of a man's face by means of a serum. Jack purchases a quantity of the black serum and surreptitiously operates on his rival, whose hue immediately deepens to the color of a pure-blooded African. Consternation greets the metamorphosis, and the parents and friends of Irene having imprudently tested the wonderful serum are in their turn changed to darkies. Jack and Irene alone escape, and without wasting time get married.

HUMAN HEARTS.—In presenting Hal Reid in his original creation of Tom Logan in "Human Hearts," we feel we have supplied a long felt want in picture stories—namely, that of presenting in person a well-known theatrical star, in a staple play, known throughout the country. The story of Tom Logan, the village smithy, stands to-day without a rival as a portrayal of the vast human emotions concealed in the hearts of life's weary travelers, and has given to the stage a memorable story enjoyed by millions of people, and is now reproduced in picture by the famous Selig Company.

We find Tom Logan busy at his forge one sultry day when the arrival of Lord and his wife Jennie takes him for a moment from his work. The sturdy manhood of Tom could not stand idly by and see Jenny abused by her husband who had in many ways made life to her seem almost a blank. Some time later we find she was compelled to leave him. Two years roll by and she returns to the little village of Cedarville with all its quaint environments that show little change. Samantha Seth, Tom and all the boys and girls are there. Logan looks with favor upon Jenny and that admiration is returned. The church bells soon tell the villagers of their happy wedding.

A year later heaven has blessed their happy home with a baby girl a wedding in the chain of life's dearest happiness. One day there comes a stranger that leaves a serpent's sting he proves none other than the worthless husband, who watches his turn and pleads with Jenny to return to him. The old love flame is rekindled and Tom is left alone. Not content with breaking his heart the former husband seeks revenge.

DORA THORNE (From Bertha M. Clay's famous novel). The beautiful story of "Dora Thorne" is so well known that it hardly needs be outlined, yet as one never tires of hearing it and for the benefit of the few, we will repeat it.

Wm. Thorne is a gardener, but there is no flower in his care that can compare with the beauty of his daughter Dora. This of course does not pass unnoticed, and as Dora chances to meet Roland, son of the Earl Westley, in the garden, it is a case of love at first sight. They meet frequently thereafter, thus causing the jealousy of Holt, another admirer of Dora, who hastens to inform her father of the meetings. Fearing that nothing good could come of this and also having arranged another marriage for Dora, her father notifies Lord Westley of his son's attention to Dora.

In spite of his father, Roland continues his attentions to the girl of his choice and while walking with her is wounded by Holt, his rival. Roland and Dora are separated and, thinking she is lost to him, he is about to be engaged to another, when he again meets Dora, who tries to escape, believing that he had cast her aside for another woman. Roland's encounter with Holt—Dora jumps into the river -Roland to the rescue and at last reconciliation follows. Roland finally succeeds in winning for his wife Dora Thorne, the gardener's daughter.

THE INDIAN RAIDERS.—The West has never been presented with its absolute fidelity and freshness when transplanted from the actual fields on which the scenes it depicts occurred. One of the most picturesque pages of the world's history would now exist in a hazy cloud of relation through pen and pencil, and would suffer from the doubt due to what might be called the artist's imagination. The embodiment of actual occurrence which thousands of plainsmen can corroborate, procured for Selig the reputation of an indelible brand of conformity to fact and history. The status of Selig's Western pictures defined long ago, their career has given justification for existence on account of ability to present the genuine characters that time will soon exhaust and render year by year a certainty of its future short existence. His rugged method of giving a picture story is as unique as its composition and absolutely true as regards the character of its personalities and participants and faithfulness to a historic realism.

As a picture of romantic history, savage and singular customs and amusements, and strangely superior cognitation transferred from the then almost mystical land of origin to the metropolitan centers, it was recognized that an innovation of a startling character had entered the field of pictures devoid of all the restrictions of artificiality and clothed in the virility of realism.

Such is the story of the "Indian Raiders." Cal Demster, a local bad man of the Niobrarra River country, quarrels with a ranch owner over the sheriff's daughter—and getting the worst of the argument, proceeds to instigate a raid on the ranch owners and drives off their horses. He is assisted by a band of outlaw Sioux Indians, herds of range stock and a general air of Selig, makes this the kind of picture that keeps your patrons coming.

MRS. BARRINGTON'S HOUSE PARTY.—All the world loves a lover, and never gets tired of a good love story; and this is a very good one, with a strange complication of affairs, which is happily set right at the proper time with a very happy ending. A young man and woman (they are necessary, of course) are in love with each other (quite natural). The young man asks the young lady's father for his daughter. The father refuses to listen to his request, and even turns a deaf ear to her pleadings for his consent.

The young folks, with the assistance of a friend, elope, get married, and keep their wedding a secret until the lady is invited to spend a "week end" at Mrs. Barrington's, to participate in the house party she is giving. The young wife manages to get Mrs. Barrington to invite her husband. Mrs. Barrington is fond of lionizing and always pleased to distinguish herself in match-making.

She readily sends the young man an invitation, and [illegible] gives [illegible] room next to and connecting with his wife's room. Everything is arranged just to [illegible] and whenever they meet in the hall [illegible] newly married couples very affectionately. One evening they meet on the balcony of the house and lovingly converse and embrace. An old busybody who is sitting at one of the windows observes them and ever ready to create gossip and scandal tells Mrs. Barrington who decides to approach her guest and ask her what it all means.

While dressing for dinner the young woman finds it impossible to properly place a pin in the back of her dress and calls on her husband in the next room through the connecting door, and just as he has finished the pinning Mrs. Barrington knocks at the outer door of the room. The wife hurriedly pushes her husband through the intervening door and as she closes it her dress is caught. Mrs. Barrington enters and as the young woman advances to greet her hostess she finds her dress held by the door. Mrs. Barrington sees her predicament and accuses her of abusing the hospitality of her home and violating common decency.

At this point the husband comes from his room and explains that they are man and wife, shows Mrs. Barrington their wedding ring and places it on his wife's finger. Mrs. Barrington is delighted and agrees to go to the young lady's father and intercede for his recognition and blessing. They all go to the father's home and win his entire approval and at the same time Mrs. Barrington wins the father's heart and hand.

THE TURN OF THE BALANCE.—Hotel life is always punctuated with new and interesting arrivals. In this instance there is a man in the case as well as a woman. They are both young and have a mutual love. The young girl is stooping at a fashionable hotel with her father when the young man appears as one of the guests. After becoming acquainted the young people pass much of their time together, and, strange to say, they do not become acquainted in the usual way.

This is the way. The young lady is playing golf and the young fellow is walking across the links when she drives a ball straight ahead, which lands with considerable force on the eye of the young man. She becomes alarmed and runs to his assistance bathing his eye by dipping her handkerchief into the lake and applying it to his injured optic.

They walk home together and she introduces him to her father, and the young man intimates to the old gentleman a desire to pay court to his daughter. The father objects on general principles or disposition, but his distemper doesn't seem to interfere with the getting together of the young folks.

On one of their strolls around the lake they see the girl's father boyishly paddling a canoe, and at a second glance see the canoe upset and the occupant fall into the water. The young man plunges into the water and saves the girl's father who, upon he recognizes his daughter's beau, expresses his gratitude and his desire to renew them acquaintance, and at the same time gives him permission to call on his daughter.

The young man, who is a stock broker, is suddenly called to the city by the fluctuating market and finds when he reaches his business that it has gone from bad to worse until ruin seems to be the end. In a hopeless state of mind he is contemplating suicide, places a revolver at his head and is only prevented from destroying himself by the ringing of the telephone bell.

He receives a message from the young girl whom he met at the hotel asking him to call and see her. He goes and she tells him she will consent to marry him. He tells her of his failure in business and that he is to go financial position to marry her. She tells him that love will find a way to secure a livelihood but riches can never purchase true love. The young man is filled with new life and ambition, declares that while he has lost wealth he is made rich indeed by her love.

DAISIES.—Harry objects to May going to college and breaking into their courtship; furthermore he declares that it makes girls mannish and strong-minded. We see May and Harry seated in a field of daisies, and just previous to the above discussion May is trying to prove Harry's love by the daisy test of "He loves me; he loves me not." He places a daisy locket about her neck in affirmation of his love.

When May reasserts her determination to go to college notwithstanding his objections, they quarrel and he departs in a huff. May confides in her chum Anne, with whom she is going to college, and Anne advises her to return Harry's engagement ring and locket and put an end to his interference. May sends back the ring but retains the locket, telling him that she lost it.

May and Anne are at college, and Harry has time to think over his separation from May and indulges in hunting and other pastimes in an effort to forget his loneliness. The girls have successfully passed their examinations for graduation and Commencement Day is near at hand. May wants to send an invitation to Harry to attend the exercises, but does not want it to appear that she is really anxious to have him come. Her chum suggests that May send an announcement without signing any name.

This plan is agreed upon, and the day of the diplomas, planting the tree and the "daisy chain" arrives, and with it comes Harry, who watches the different ceremonies with much interest, wistfully glancing here and there to locate May. The graduates pass in procession carrying the "daisy [illegible] last [illegible] Harry [illegible] death comes across May. She is surprised, acts somewhat "coy." He adds [illegible] to [illegible] and she comes to him and shooting [illegible] from the rest of the people to look [illegible] still loves him, and tells her of his regret [illegible] unresisting opposition to her college [illegible].

She then confesses she still loves him, and taking the "daisy locket" which she has kept and always cherished she plucks a daisy from the field and picking off the petals repeats "He loves me, he loves me not," at which he [illegible] her arm and says "I do with all my heart."

BACK TO NATURE.—A chauffeur falls in love with his employer's daughter and she ignores him by her haughtiness and indifference. She is kind to his attentions. Later the employer's services is appointed Consul-General to Australia.

The chauffeur goes along with the family and they are now on board a steamer on their way to Australia. A storm arises and the vessel is wrecked. Everybody seems helpless to save themselves but the chauffeur who with his brain and brawn, succeeds in getting the Consul-General and his family safely to shore. They are sadly lacking in clothing and essentials, and again the chauffeur's quick wit comes into play. He makes them comfortable, cheers them up in every way and starts in to build a hut and secure provisions, showing the superiority of mental and muscular attainments when it comes to an emergency, and he proves himself master of the situation winning the respect and admiration of all.

The Consul's daughter gradually realizing that in the chauffeur there dwells the real manly courage and courtesy which are characteristic of true heroes cannot resist a growing appreciation of his worth. After living many days in this primitive fashion a ship is seen on the horizon. At once the chauffeur raises signals and attracts attention to the island and the wrecked party.

The captain of the vessel steers near shore and sends boats which take the wrecked Consul-General and his party to the ship, and they are all put aboard bound for Australia. En route to their destination the chauffeur again proposes to the Consul's daughter, and this time she accepts him. The young people tell the father who is somewhat surprised and opposed to the match; but he consents, feeling assured that in the chauffeur his daughter will have a protector as well as a husband who will always show himself equal to the occasion, no matter what may be the circumstances.

UNDER THE OLD APPLE TREE.—The peddler, burdened with his pack trudging along, weary and footsore, holding his little motherless child by the hand, stops under a shading tree and bids the little girl, who is no less tired than himself, to sit under the tree while he tries to dispose of his goods and he will return for her in a short time. The child falls asleep. The father, in crossing a roadway, is struck by an automobile and taken to a hospital unconscious. The little girl awakens from her nap, and when she finds herself alone, begins to cry and starts running in a frightened daze, calling for her father.

The children of a widow, a big-hearted farmwife, are playing under an old apple tree. The mother's child in passing is heard crying. One of the children hears her as he is standing on the ladder at the top of the wall and he and his sister bring the poor child to their good mother and she takes the little one into her home as one of her own.

The peddler recovers from his injuries, is discharged from the hospital and goes in search of his child. While passing under the old apple tree where the children are playing where his child found friends and a home he sees the apples hanging from the branches and climbs the wall to help himself to some. When he gains the top of the wall the children are again seen playing under the old apple tree, this time increased by the presence of the peddler's own child. He is astonished and delighted and unhesitatingly jumps down among the youngsters and clasps his little daughter to his bosom.

The child tells her little friends about her papa, and they all take him to the good mother who gives him a position to help her in running the farm. The next scene is some time after the last one, and it shows the former peddler carrying the children on his back for he is now their stepfather, while the kindly housewife is now the stepmother of his child.

THE THREE CHERRY PITS.—An old French veteran who has distinguished himself in active service under the command of Napoleon Bonaparte and been decorated with "The Cross of the Legion of Honor" for bravery, is proud of his distinction with the old school of gentlemen heroes and bears himself with that hauteur which is noticeable in one of his class.

In search of refreshment, as is his custom he seats himself at a table in one of the Parisian gardens where, seated at a table opposite are three young men, who pass remarks about the veteran's odd dress and manners, disrespectfully imitating his actions and casting innuendoes upon his peculiarities. Growing bolder one of the young chaps takes a pit from one of the cherries which they are eating and flips it at the veteran. They all laugh as the cherry pit strikes him in the arm.

The old gentleman picks up the pit and ties it in one corner of his handkerchief. Another one of the young men flips a cherry pit at the old [illegible]

Located in the city in a cheap, poorly furnished room, Helen is trying to keep up her courage and content herself with her meager fare and depleted purse. Hearing a knock at the door, Helen opens it, and one of her newly formed acquaintances, a chorus girl, enters.

She induces Helen to go to dinner with her. The poor child, conscious of her inferior wardrobe, enters the gilded halls of revelry like a timid fawn. Surrounded by the revelers, who are fast becoming intoxicated, Helen wishes for a chance to escape from the trap which has been set for her. One of the party, a young man named Howard, makes advances to Helen. One of the women takes a bouquet of roses from the vase on the table and shakes the rose leaves over the young man and Helen. Like magic they remind Helen of home and mother, and she casts off the spell which has been thrown about her, denounces Howard and his companions, and seizes her wraps and leaves the place.

Howard is nonplussed and offers to bet he will follow Helen and bring her back. He goes, but she will not listen to his invitation to re-visit the restaurant, and tells him to leave her presence. He feels ashamed and avows that he loves her and will prove worthy of her love. Howard returns to the dinner and declares himself a changed man with a fixed purpose to lead a better life, and bids them all good-bye.

Howard goes to see Helen, and finally they become engaged to marry, and when she goes home he goes with her. She finds her mother seated in the garden under the roses. Helen introduces her fiance to her mother. In the last scene Helen and Howard are passing through the rose garden just after their marriage ceremony, clothed in their wedding garments.

JEAN AND THE CALICO DOLL.—A large sum of money is exchanged between Mr. Doyle and another man, who pays the money to Mr. Doyle. During the transaction Mr. Doyle's son is sitting at the window and his little daughter is playing with her collie dog, "Jean," on the floor. The father sees the man to the front door, leaving his son and daughter in the room where he left the money on the table.

The son leaves the room, and the little girl, who is now alone in the room, sees the money, and thinking it is only paper, takes it out in the garden and puts it in the little cradle with her calico doll and cuts one or two of the bank notes into dolls. After the child has gone out the father returns to the room and cannot find the money. He calls the wife; she knows nothing about it, and the father accuses the son of stealing it. The son is indignant, and leaves home. He has hardly left the house when the little girl comes in with the money and gives it to her mother and shows her the pretty paper doll she has made out of one of the bills. The dog follows with another bunch of the money which the child has dropped. The mother calls her husband, and the child explains that she thought the money just paper and she is grieved to hear her brother, whom she dearly loves, has been accused of stealing and has left home.

She starts out with her calico doll to find her brother, her collie dog following after her. She wanders through the fields and wood, where she falls, trying to reach a flower, down a steep embankment onto some rocks, spraining her ankle and lying unconscious. The faithful dog tries to rouse her, and, finding it impossible, runs home to get the child's parents to understand him in his efforts to report the child's accident. He rushes back to the child, carries her calico doll to the parents and makes them realize that the child is missing and in danger.

While worrying over the loss of their son, here is another loss of their daughter. The son is brought back home by his attachment for his little sister and mother, and when he learns of the loss of his sister and sees "Jean" with her calico doll, he follows him to the place of her accident and brings her safely home.

FANTASTIC FURNITURE.—The opening scene [illegible] and heroine, a young married couple, [illegible] restaurant, and it is evident, as they rise to [illegible] that they have dined well. Meanwhile, [illegible] that the careless porter had admitted to the [illegible] couple's apartment two suspicious looking [illegible] their boy. They are in the drawing room when the returning footsteps are heard. To conceal themselves, one seats himself in the armchair and hides beneath the cover; the other creeps under the table, while the boy takes the place of the [illegible] stool. The young wife throws herself with a sigh of content into the armchair, only to be clasped immediately in the arms of the hidden man. She jumps up with a scream, but the phenomenon is put down to the effect of too much champagne, until the piano stool, followed by the table and chair, walk unassisted out of the room. Hubby, after riddling the real chair with shot, wakes up to the necessity of pursuit, in which all and sundry are upset.

AN UNEXPECTED SERVANT.—The Newriches' butler and maid throw up their situations on the night of the great ball. There is no time to get substitutes and the son-in-law is shaved by force, given the butler's coat, and made to understand that he must take the latter's place. Not unnaturally a great deal of confusion arises from the new servant's methods of performing his duties. He persists in shaking hands with a great many of the guests and they are infuriated at the familiarity of their friends' servant with their wives. A party of male guests in the smoking room are more disgusted when the butler familiarly slaps one and another on the back, and they unite to throw him, out bodily. After numerous farcical situations his betterhalf offers him his own coat, and exclaiming, "I throw up the job!" he discloses his real identity.

BISON.

THE MASCOT OF COMPANY "D."—The splendid efficiency of the United States Army has been due to the mode of discipline. Transgressors against military law receive scant sympathy. This story deals with a military post on the frontier. The colonel's little boy is the pet of the camp. He falls into the hands of hostile Indians, and the film abounds with critical situations, including the thrilling rescue of the little chap and his restoration to his father's arms.

Woven into the story as a part of the plot is the dishonorable discharge of a soldier and his public degradation, stripping from his uniform the buttons and stripes.

Excellent views are had of Indian life and savage warfare, the soldiers' stockade and camp life, an the final battle in which the redmen are exterminated is startlingly realistic.

KIT CARSON.—Kit Carson, the scout, picturesquely attired, mounted on a whirlwind horse, saves a band of settlers from the attack of an Indian band. The savages are discovered by Carson in full war paint riding at breakneck speed to the attack. In a sensational gallop from cabin to cabin he rounds up the settlers and sees them safely installed in the stockade. Scene after scene of startling intensity is shown, holding the audience breathless as the mad race for cover is made, with the shrieking Indians missing their quarry by a providential second. Carson knows full well that the little band cannot long withstand the attack of the savages, and rides for reinforcements, urging his steed to a terrific pace. While he is absent the unequal conflict is raging, the pioneers' wives and children loading the guns and the men firing. The Indians circle round and round, showering volleys of arrows into the little fortress. The ranks of the whites are thinned and the redmen suffer heavy losses when the invaders succeed in setting fire to the stockade. In the meantime Carson has reached a camp of trappers. The situation is explained in a word and they dash furiously to the rescue, arriving in the nick of time. The Indians are put to rout, followed to their camp and destroyed, and their tepees burned. The last picture shows the whites riding away, leaving behind them a spectacular blaze as a grim reminder of their vengeance.

A FATAL VENGEANCE.—This film shows the folly of wrongdoing, and the tragic fate which befell a woman who violated conventionalities. Mrs. Lydia West, a beautiful young woman, is infatuated with a former sweetheart, who declines her attentions. With her pride mortally wounded she plans vengeance and writes an anonymous letter to her husband advising him that his wife would entertain her lover that evening, and also writes to the object of her affections pleading with him to call and say good-bye for the last time, as she has important matters to discuss with him. The man accordingly arrives at the house and is set upon by the husband and his friends. A duel results, and as the two men fire at each other the woman rushes between them and receives one of the pistol shots. Overcome with remorse at her own actions, she deliberately paid for the folly of her deeds with her life.

FRICOT'S ITCHING POWDER.—Fricot finds his father asleep and takes advantage of the opportunity to pour down his parent's back a handful of itching powder. The poor man's antics in attempting to relieve himself of his distress are ludicrous and finally result in incurring the wrath of his wife and her mother, who set upon him and beat him until exhausted. To his amazement he discovers that the blows have a salutary effect and he submits to the thrashing. When the women finally leave him alone he arises well pleased, as his affliction has been overcome.

THE ACROBAT'S SON.—A party of acrobats are seen practising, their offspring placed on a rug on the ground. Jane with her charge in a perambulator watches them, until Jack comes along and invites her to take a turn on the roundabout. Heedless of her charge, Jane accepts. Now two idlers, looking on, resolve to have some fun and change the two children's places. Jane coming back, wheels away the perambulator without noticing any change in the babies. Ten years go by and we see Mr. and Mrs. Clark with their only child, who astonishes them by his acrobatical tendencies. He is seen doing some most clever tricks, whilst in the acrobats' home the acrobats are in despair to find in their supposed offspring his utter inability to perform their tricks. Just at this time they receive a letter in which they read: "It is just ten years now since we played a base trick in changing your child with that of Mr. Clark, of Gerrard. At this address you will find your boy well cared for." No time is lost. They go to the address, taking the boy with them. Explanations follow, and the boys are changed to their mutual satisfaction.

THE CHEMIST'S MISTAKE.—Mrs. Jones' cough has been very troublesome, but money is very short and little Dolly is sent by her father to induce that kind old Mr. Burrows, the neighboring chemist, to let them have a bottle of soothing syrup mixture on trust. Off she goes and succeeds in getting the syrup; the bottle falls on the ground, is smashed and the whole of the contents spilled. Now after little Dolly's departure from the chemist's shop Mr. Burrows' assistant discovers that the wrong bottle has been given to the child and instead of the medicine it was a bottle of poison. Running out into the street, the man demands of passersby if they have seen a child carrying a bottle, but without success, and returns to the nearby distrought old gentleman, who sends him out into the street again in a vain search for the child. Mr. Burrows, left alone, realizes to the full extent his awful mistake and is in the act of placing a revolver to his head, when at that moment little Dolly comes in with tears in her eyes, begging for another bottle of the supposed medicine. Hardly realizing the good news, the surprised child is assured of another bottle and the old gentleman starts off with the child to her home, where he himself pours out the true syrup and to the surprise and joy of little Dolly's parents he leaves a banknote in the child's hands.

THANHOUSER COMPANY.

A DAINTY POLITICIAN.—Congressman Casey is a type of the ward politician who is now, fortunately, being rapidly eliminated from politics. He is planning his re-election to Congress. The decent element in the community has been aroused and a movement is on foot to nominate Professor Blake, a citizen of high standing and character.

John Willett, a reporter for the Daily Globe, calls on Professor Blake to inform him that he will be requested to run for the nomination and shows him an article on the subject that has appeared in the Daily Globe. Professor Blake receives him cordially and he meets Professor Blake's daughter, Marie; the young people proceed to fall in love.

The time for the convention arrives. As the convention is assembling and before they proceed to business, a band of suffragettes headed by Miss Croup gain admission and attempt to get a plank introduced in the platform favoring "Votes for Women." The convention turns them down and they are ejected from the floor. Nominations are then made for candidates and after a vote has been taken it is found that the ballots for Casey and M P WORLD—Twenty-seven Professor Blake are very evenly divided and that a candidate named Jennings, who is receiving the fewest votes, holds the balance of power. The convention takes a recess and Casey endeavors to bribe Jennings to retire in his favor and throw all his votes Casey-ward.

Willett overhears enough of the bargain to make him suspicious, and communicates his beliefs to Marie. Between them they contrive to so fix the connection of the telephone in Casey's room that they can overhear the completion of the bribery plot. They succeed in this, and hear Jennings agree to the bargain for the consideration of a large sized check which Casey hands to him.

The convention reconvenes and John Willett appears and makes the charge publicly that Casey has bribed Jennings to throw his votes. Casey and Jennings indignantly deny this and Marie comes forward as a witness; whereupon Jennings and Casey try to leave the convention. Delegates grab Jennings, search him and find the check given to him by Casey. The two are ejected from the convention, which at once nominates Professor Blake [illegible] the two lovers who made that [illegible] possible.

THE LATCHKEY.—Bill and Jack are pro[illegible] [illegible] and close friends. Bill has a [illegible] wife John lives in [illegible]. When Bill goes to the country on his vacation he leaves the latchkey to his apartment with Jack, telling him to make himself at home while he (Bill) is out of town. The [illegible] janitress in the house in which Bill lives is [illegible] with the bright idea that she can sublet Bill's apartment during his absence and thus make some extra money.

May and Belle are two pretty young girls, who are in business in town, and finding a desirable furnished apartment to let, decide to try their hand at housekeeping. They rent Bill's apartment through the janitress and settle down very comfortably in their new quarters.

Not knowing that the flat is occupied, John decides to take advantage of his friend's invitation and make use of his rooms. He lets himself in with the borrowed latchkey, and is amazed to find the two girls sound asleep. Believing him to be a burglar, the girls threaten him with annihilation a pipe which they pretend is a pistol (one of Bill's which they have discovered in the room) being used as a weapon. John thinks the joke too good to spoil by explanations, so does not try to square himself, but instead pleads for mercy. May scores his solemn promise that he will never "burgle" again and allows him to escape.

Unknown to John, May has been engaged by his partner as stenographer, and when she enters the office the following morning and finds John opening the safe, she decides that once again her burglar has been caught red-handed. She calls for help, and is greatly chagrined when her supposed burglar is introduced to her as her employer. Amid laughing explanations, the "burglar" and the lady shake hands and become good friends.

THE COWBOY AND THE EASTERNER.—When the Widow Melrose opened the letter from her brother, who has one of the finest ranches in the Middle West, and read his invitation to come out for a couple of months and bring her daughter along she was overjoyed. The daughter, too, is delighted, and impulsively asks her sweetheart, a young New Yorker, to come along with them. He eagerly accepts and a few days after the receipt of the letter they are on their way West. Sam Stout has all the available cowboys on the place, with an Indian or two, to meet the party from the East, and they sure do give them a rousing welcome. Loaded with grips and bags, the party starts for the buckboard to carry them to the ranch, when Mabel, the widow's daughter, catches her first and sudden view of an Indian. She promptly screams and throws her arms about the neck of the most available man, who happens to be George Matthews, her uncle's favorite cowboy. He assures her there is no danger and offers his escort, which is gladly accepted by the interested girl; all this to the discomfiture of the youth from the East. It doesn't take many days before Mabel and George are almost constant companions and when the Easterner complains of the girl's neglect of him the widow concludes that the cowboy must stop calling on her daughter. She insists upon Matthews going away, and when she appeals strongly to his honor he has no other alternative but to go. Uncle Stout, anticipating the result of the widow's talk, makes other arrangements and asks George not to go until the following day. He then prepares and executes a plan that not only succeeds in showing the calibre of both the cowboy and the Easterner, but actually forces the young fellow to go back East on the first train, and also causes the widow to remove all obstacles in the path of the affairs of her daughter and the Westerner, and it did not take George very long to decorate the littlest finger in the world with a diamond. And this is the scheme Uncle Stout planned: He invited the Easterner and his niece for an outing in the canyon and purposely leaving the young folks to spoon, he steals away with his sister. This was the signal for a certain cowboy, disguised as a bear to appear and the frightened Easterner lost no time in getting away, leaving the fainting girl to be eaten as he feared he himself would be. The cunning rancher also had his cowboy George near the spot. He heard the screams and rescued the fair lady, but failed to see the bear because that particular bear was by that time disrobing himself with much amusement amidst his companions.

IN THE BLACK HILLS.—"Let not thy angry passions rise." But, as with most of us, Henry Russell remembered this wise advice too late and now could only sigh as he thought how easily he might have avoided the quarrel with Joe Wilkes, one of the assayers in the stamp mills for it had resulted in their both being discharged when Supt. Bedlow appeared on the scene. The pretty little home that he and Dora had planned became a mere speck in the distance. It would be months, and perhaps years, before he could again work himself up to a position equal to the one he had just left. The young wife, after trying in vain to comfort her discharged husband, donned her hat and stole out quietly. She would go to the mills and plead with them to give Henry one more chance. At first the superintendent was inclined to refuse; then, struck by Dora's ingenuousness, he gave her a note reinstating the young man. Fred Bedlow was a good husband and counted an honorable man, so it might have been the little wife's enthusiasm or a man's inborn curiosity which led him to call on her the next day. There he soon learned her true sentiments and would have withdrawn after humbly begging her pardon, so that nothing could have come of the incident, had not Joe Wilkes, knowing that Dora had succeeded in having Henry reengaged, called to urge his own case and, being again ordered from the premises, had followed the superintendent only to see him enter the Russell cottage. Here was a chance for revenge. Without waiting an instant he ran to the mills and scratched off a few lines to Henry, who, although he implicitly trusted Dora, decided to find out what Bedlow's idea was in calling upon his wife. And although he arrived to find Dora in tears and the superintendent begging her pardon and trying to pacify her, all might still have been explained away, had not Mrs. Bedlow, accompanied by her father, sailed in to accuse her husband—for, in going to the mills to examine some newly discovered ore, the unsuspecting wife had smoothed out the very note Henry had dropped on which to examine her specimens. Mrs. Bedlow, after relieving her mind of what she thought of Dora, her husband and men in general, departed for her automobile, leaving the superintendent to hurry after her and implore the lady's father to intercede for him. So it was, still in hot discussion, that Henry found them just outside his gate, as he ran distractedly from the house after reading the pitiable little note declaring her innocence, which Dora had written while he had been packing his things. The note wound up by saying that he would find her body on the railroad tracks. Frantically he showed it to the now half reconciled Mrs. Bedlow and the superintendent solemnly swore Dora had written the truth. She commanded them to enter her car. Already they could hear the whistle of the approaching train and, as they swung into the road, which ran parallel with the track, and turned on full speed, they were just even with the engine. A wild race of over a mile followed, and scarcely had Henry and the superintendent snatched the half unconscious Dora from the tracks when the train dashed by. Quickly they bore her to safety, where reconciliations between four hysterically happy people were soon made.

YANKEE

WHO KILLED JOHN DARE?—The killing of John Dare caused more than ordinary excitement in the inland city in which it occurred—due to his prominence in business and social circles, as well as his mysterious death. The body was found in front of the home of a respected and prosperous resident of the city, to whose daughter Dare had been paying attention. Circumstances preceding the discovery of Dare's corpse, seriously involved three people as being implicated in his death, and it was the careful and painstaking investigation and sound and logical deduction of the local chief of police, which solved the mystery and conclusively proved that Dare had been killed accidentally and in a peculiar manner.

KING OF A DAY.—This subject deals with an episode of the Neapolitan revolution in 1647. The Duke of Arcos had imposed such drastic taxes upon the people that they rebelled, and when a proclamation of added imposition was posted in the town, under the leadership of Masaniello they tore it down and burned it. Marching to the palace they presented an ultimatum to the Duke, who, in face of the tremendous odds, feigned to submit gracefully to the demands of the people. Carrying the deceit further, he appointed Masaniello captain-general, with royal powers. He then gave a banquet to which he invited Masaniello, and in a speech lauded the general to the skies. Responding to the toast, Masaniello drinks from a glass in which the Duke had placed a terrible poison which drives Masaniello to madness. Drawing his sword, he marches down the street, compelling all he met to do him homage. His mad deeds are brought to a climax when he attacks a statue of the Virgin, an object of veneration by the Neapolitans, in front of the Carmel Church. The outraged populace falls upon him and destroys him. The Duke, surcharged with pity, silently soliloquizes over the corpse of his vanished foe, and immediately re-establishes the taxes, which the disconsolate public, bereft of its leader, accepts ignominiously. The madness of Masaniello, depicted by Albert Lambert, the noted French actor, is remarkable in its intensity of action, and the film throughout is a masterpiece.

FABIAN'S HOLLOW TOOTH.—This versatile actor succeeds in making even the distressing pain of a toothache seem funny. He has all sorts of amusing adventures in his endeavors to get rid of his troublesome tooth, but it is not removed until the dentist has hired the services of two men and a rope. The tooth then comes out—an enormous object—and from its hollow crown the dentist, after the style of a conjurer, takes all sorts of queer objects.

A SOCIETY SINNER. A lady who has expensive tastes and is always getting because her husband does not make her a larger allowance, on visiting which she sees a pocketbook full of banknotes lying about. She takes the notes, and her hostess, when she discovers the loss, suspects her own son, who secretly admires the thief. For her sake he accepts the blame, but the husband accidentally finds the money in his wife's possession. She makes confession, but her hostess is so glad her son is innocent, that she forgives.

IMP

THE WIDOW.—The lure of the widow is over all mankind, with the accent on the man. Wherever she goeth, if she be a young, attractive wid., there will be a retinue of masculine followers always in her wake—and sometimes even when she is not awake. Two young men of that type whose thoughts in Spring always turn lightly to thoughts of unplatonic affection, and in the Fall to breach of promise suits, hear that an old friend of theirs is now a widow and is stopping at the seaside hotel, and they decide to go down there and see whether a renewed friendship cannot, under the glare of the old moon, ripen into something more exciting and enervating. They arrive and simultaneously start their amorous campaigns. But, alas! women were deceivers ever, and men were receivers ever—receivers of flattering, ego tickling, sugar-coated deceptions that make each of our sentimental swains believe that he is the favorite, while in reality she does not care for either. One of them, who has his own idea of a hero, steals her child with the intention of returning it and becoming one in her eyes, but the other inconveniently happens on the scene, transfers the hero's role to himself, and wins the goddess's good graces. She banishes the would-be thief and allows the other one to escort her to her city home. There he comes to visit her, and in order to obtain refreshments she leaves him in the parlor. The luckless suitor, who, albeit, is plucky enough to call around and make an attempt at explaining things somewhat, rings the bell, and on seeing him she quickly dons her maid's apron and cap, opens the door, and, posing as the maid, invites him into the kitchen. She makes him put on the butler's clothes and asks him to serve the company in the parlor. He ambles into the room with a tray filled with drinks and on seeing his friend there—well, there are all kinds of riots, but the one that follows the meeting between the Romeos is in a bin all by itself. The woman becomes frightened and calls in the big, burly iceman, who throws them out bodily. When they finally arise from the spot of their abrupt destination, they return to their hall-room and nurse their black eyes, their bruises and a strong desire for vengeance.

THE RIGHT GIRL.—There is always a right girl for all of us; sometime, somewhere, somehow we find her. But often the discovery leads through strange channels and peculiar by-ways. A young heiress, discouraged by fruitless efforts to secure a suitable husband at the sea shore and fashionable summer resorts, decides to go to visit her old nurse, to recuperate and forget the ills and woes occasioned by man and his fickleness during the past summer. She does not want the town people to know she is an heiress, so she changes places with the nurse's daughter. In the same town there is living, or trying to live, a youth who is pretty much "down and out" and he receives a letter from a city friend saying that this heiress is in town. The friend sends him some of the cold lucre that is essential toward his winning her good graces, advising him to board at the house at which she is staying. He follows out his friend's instructions, goes to the house with the intention of courting the heiress, but instead of falling in love with the one he believes is she, he falls in love with the supposed nurse's daughter. While he is out with her one day they

HAZING A NEW SCHOLAR. Hiram Perkins, the son of one of these stanch, old farmers, who believe that great men come only from our [illegible] universities, and like all fathers, thinks [illegible] is bright enough to get along at college. So one fine day, he takes him to the big city, to lead him by the hand into the Temple of Wisdom. Of course, the sights of the big city amaze them, and [illegible] they have saved their necks from speeding chauffeurs and reckless drivers we see them in the office of the college.

As soon as the passing students see the lanky boobish youth, they have his program all figured out, and that night when he is just rolling into bed to plan his triumphs over Cicero and Socrates, they enter his room, and before he can turn a blanket envelopes him and he is on his unwilling way to the woods. Arrived at an inviting tree, the hazers give him the kind of a welcome one can easily imagine and then depart, without extending him the courtesy of releasing him from the ropes that bind him to the tree.

Night comes and he has not yet returned to the college. The boys become worried, and finally go out in search of him. In the few hours that passed he succeeded in a desperate struggle to free himself and, a stranger in the woods, he lost his way. Tired and weak, he at last dropped from exposure and exhaustion, and the searchers find his unconscious form. Alarmed, they carry him back to the dormitory where a physician and nurse are kept busy reviving him.

He is still in bed, but recovering, when the hazers file in and ask him to forgive and forget. Hiram is a good scout and extends the glad hand willingly, especially after the boys have told him that when another new student comes to the college he will be given a chance to get even with a vengeance.

THINK OF LAEMMLE!

When you decide to buy that new projecting machine or anything else needed for your moving picture theatre, think of Laemmle. My recent order for One Hundred Power's machines (at one crack) will give you an idea of the capacity of my various offices for supplying you immediately with every possible want. When you make up your mind to assert your independence and tell "Gen. Flimco" whereinel to get off, think of Laemmle. Think of the marvelous success that has been built up by sheer force of Laemmle quality, Laemmle service and Laemmle boosting. There seems to be no end of the present landslide toward independence. Get in while the getting is good. Wake up. Protect that investment of yours. Cut out that $2 a week. Don't help build up "Gen. Flimco" to the point where he will be strong enough to kick you out of your own box office, strangle your business and dump you to the discard! Be independent—but be independent RIGHT! Connect with Laemmle, write to Laemmle and think of Laemmle.

MOTION PHOTOGRAPHY

The most wonderful innovation in the amusement producing world is Motion Photography, however it has gone through many hard struggles before reaching that state of preeminent perfection. It has been the cry of the audience. "Yes the picture is good, but I am compelled to strain my eyes to see it," or "The theatre is so dark when the pictures are on that I cannot see to find a seat, or "The details are not brought out plain enough," or "If a person could see the expression of the face in the picture, it would unfold the story better," that all of these very vital defects were not conductive to comfort and pleasure one should expect when seeking entertainment at a place of amusement.

Many cities have taken up this question.. How can the Picture theatres be better lighted; it is not good for the moral conditions to have our younger people in a place that is pitch dark during a performance.

ALL OF THE ABOVE HAS BEEN ANSWERED! The eyes are not strained, but instead are rested The theatre is not dark—one can see a vacant seat on the farther side of the house. The details are so vividly stereoscopic that one can hardly realize that it is a picture, it looks so real. One can readily follow the story, as the expression of the face, the movement of the lips, the light of the eye, in fact one is looking at living, breathing, expressive reproductions taken from life and reproduced just as life is itself.

Dear Sirs:

The Mirror Screen we have recently installed in our demonstration room has turned out to our entire satisfaction. We find that the picture is brought out more clearly and that especially in the case of colored subjects, the different colors come out most beautifully.

We will be glad to demonstrate the advantage of your screen to anyone you may refer to us and remain, with best wishes.

Yours very truly,
PATHE FRERES,

Gentlemen:

June 24th, 1910.

We have completed the installation and wish to say that the Mirror Screen is the most wonderful invention in the history of the moving picture business. It is the only screen that gives a perfect picture in every detail, so lifelike does it make the picture that every frown and wrinkle on the actor's face is minutely perceptible, and the actors seem ready to step out of the frame at any moment. Clear as a crystal, and are increased over 100% in brilliancy and beauty over the ordinary cotton or aluminum curtain. It will pay for itself for it will double our business in a short time.

Respectfully yours, (Signed) Louis F. Steuerle, Prest.

Knights Templar Conclave

INDEPENDENT FEATURE FILM

Photographed at Chicago, Aug. 8-12

Every Knight Templar in the country as well as every member of the Masonic Order will want to see this film. It pictures with all its details every one of the great events of the 31st Triennial Conclave of the Knights Templar, which was recently held at Chicago. The film shows with remarkable clearness the great parade in which over 30,000 men from every State in the Union, Canada and England participated. It shows the great crowd of over half a million people that saw this greatest of all parades, as well as the wonderful decorations. The week in Chicago was one of historical interest and the events of this celebration have a great interest for everybody. Every independent exhibitor should book this film at once and then advertise it. The scenes that this film portrays will be a revelation to the vast numbers that were unable to attend, and exhibitors who neglected to secure these films will miss a most excellent opportunity.

REMARKABLE LETTERS: No. 101

COZY THEATER, Independence, Mo., August 15, 1910.

Gentlemen:

I shall have to quit running your pictures—or else enlarge my house. Your ad. says, "Say Thanhouser to the Exchange Man." Well, I have said it till they now call me the "Thanhouser Kid."

I have been following the pictures for the past six years, therefore I believe I can tell the good from the bad. Believing that it might interest you to know what your firm has done for an exhibitor out here in the State where they must be shown, I am about to trespass upon your time and good nature.

I took this house about three months ago. It had been in operation for a year and a half under a dozen different managements, running all kinds of pictures from junk trust stuff to a so-called Independent service which should have cost 50 cents per reel. THIS TOWN FELT THAT THERE WAS ONLY ONE FIRM IN THE BUSINESS THAT COULD MAKE A MOTION PICTURE. Anything that carried the Biograph title was good and every other make they felt was "rotten." When I announced that hereafter we would use only a high-class Independent service, every one—employees and patrons—put up a roar that you could hear to St. Louis. I contracted with the Bijou Film and Amusement Company and they gave me your "Jane Eyre," and on Monday night I did the greatest business the house had ever done. I thought at the time that some fellow with a camera had formed another company and had made a lucky shot at a subject. However, I began to see that the second night of a program that had a Thanhouser reel was always better than the first night. I began to "Say Thanhouser to the exchange man" and to-day I have ran almost everything the Bijou has. I am starting on the second week that I haven't taken in m... "Thanhouser Picture To-day" poster and if I can scrape up enough I w... run a couple more.

They say any fool can criticize, but it takes a smart man to write a book. However, I would like to suggest a few things. There is one point in all your advertising that you overlook. Did you know that you can run your pictures on 50 per cent. of the electricity that you can any other make? Everyone is trying to help the theater to save on its light bill except the film companies themselves. Put it up to an operator and find how little light will really put a brilliant picture on the screen—if it's a Thanhouser.

Please put me on your mailing list and again accept my thanks for the good you have done me. I am, Yours. (Signed) H. C. EVERETT.

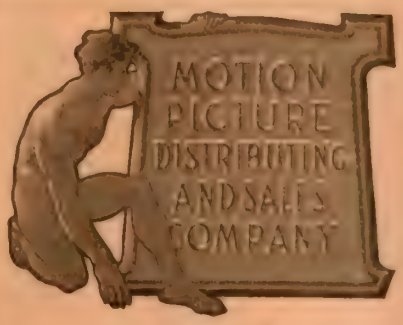
Say "THANHOUSER" to the Exchange Man!



He Didn't Know It Was Loaded!

New York City, August 25. (Special Despatch.)—John Smith was shot and instantly killed to-day by the accidental discharge of a revolver he was handling. He did not know it was loaded.

The cry is universal: "I didn't know it was loaded." The exchange men didn't know it was loaded till the trust gobbled them up. The exhibitor does'nt know it was loaded but he will have a rude awakening.

You are loading up with your royalties and rentals a huge gun. Its muzzle is pointed directly at you. YOU ARE AT THE WRONG END OF IT, for the trust has its fingers on the trigger. When the smoke clears away do you want to holler that you didn't know it was loaded?

GET OUT OF RANGE AT ONCE. You will not only better yourself financially by using our splendid program, but will help weaken the power of the trust.

"YOU SAVED MY LIFE"

That's the title of the Imp release of Monday, Sept. 5. It's going to rip the moving picture business wide open and make the whole blamed country rock with laughter! It shows the experiences of an actor in a moving picture studio. Just think of the possibilities for fun! And we didn't overlook a blessed opportunity to make it a screamer! If you don't laugh 990 laughs for this 990 foot-film, your bump of humor is as extinct as the dear old dodo bird. Begin to ask your exchange for it at 9 o'clock every morning this week.

"A SISTER'S SACRIFICE"

This will be released Thursday, Sept 8 and will take its place among the four best Imp dramas ever produced. It is one of the simplest stories in the world, yet it will make the deepest and best kind of impression on your patrons. If you really want Imp films, why don't you either force your exchange to buy them for you or else switch to some exchange that will? Why indeed!

The Reason Why

The Motiograph

PROJECTS A MUCH BETTER PICTURE

THAN OTHER MACHINES

Is that it is the only machine that has the

Patented Double Cone Shutter

The Patented Double Cone Shutter does what other shutters will not do, because it shortens the time by two-thirds on both the opening and closing of the aperture.

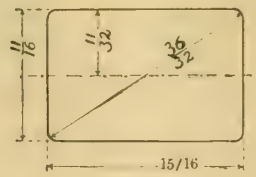

Fig. 1.

1. The Light Aperture measures 36/32 iuch from corner to corner and 22/32 inch high. (See Fig. 1.

2. The Disc Shutter used in other machines travels from corner to corner 22/32 inch. (See Fig. 2.)

3. The Double Cone Shutter travels top to bottom and bottom to top 22/32 inch. (See Fig. 3.)

4. To close Light Aperture, the two wings meet half way with a travel of 11/32 inch each.

5. Saving in opening movement of cone shutter over disc type about 2/3.

The Fall Outlook.

The date of this number of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, September 3, marks the beginning of the Fall season in the moving picture business. Official summer is over, and people are returning to the cities, and work. In the moving picture field there have been for the last two months, if not nothing doing at any rate comparatively little. Closed houses, idle exchanges, manufacturers marking time; these have been the characteristics of the business during the summer. Everybody has been waiting for September to resume high pressure activity. September is here at last. So, in the current locution, let's all "get busy."

What are the prospects for the Fall? We asked this same question this time last year. We answered it in an optimistic and reassuring manner. The outlook, then, on the evidence we obtained was bright. We proved to be true prophets, for the past year on the whole was an exceedingly good one for the business, which has advanced by leaps and bounds in the last twelve months. Now, as to the immediate future? Without waste of words we unhesitatingly say that the prospects of the business are immensely, nay, immeasurably brighter to-day than they were a year ago.

Some months ago we wrote an article in which we pointed out that the exhibitor was having a golden time. Thousands upon thousands of exhibitors throughout the world read this paper, yet there was only one of them with the temerity to gainsay what we said. He, poor man, was probably an exception to the general rule, and maybe was a victim of local conditions. It is ridiculous to suppose that everybody in a business can be equally or proportionately prosperous.

Now, by singular good fortune, we, in the last few weeks, have received a series of visits from exhibitors operating in various parts of this great country. They have come East from all parts; from the extreme West; from the Middle West, from the North and from the South. A stream of successful exhibitors in close touch with the public, who, without exception, reported good business all last season. They detect no sign of loss of public interest in the picture. On the contrary it is their unanimous experience that the picture is ascending higher and higher in public favor and that the better classes of people are being attracted to it, and that there is a growing distaste for that which is not elevating and refining in theme. In short, the picture to-day, as an entertaining factor, occupies a far loftier position than it did twelve months ago.

As to the future; we closely questioned all these exhibitors as to their impressions of the kind of business that was likely to be done in the coming season. Without exception, they look forward to another golden time. In our experience through life, we have been brought into contact with men engaged in many industries; men whose duty it has been to exercise foresight in regard to the likely course of events, in a particular industry, but we have not met more confident, more optimistic, than the picture men, who have streamed through this office the last few weeks.

From the exhibiting end of matters there is an obvious step: that is to the manufacturing. All the licensed manufacturers are busy up to the hilt enlarging their plants, and are selling more prints this year than they did this time last year. As to the Independent manufacturers, those of them who have survived the stress and competition of the first year of their existence, are confident of their immediate future, at any rate. What their ultimate future in the business will be, neither they nor we can conjecture. The exchange end of matters is one that in the present unsettled state of this section of the business, we do not feel justified in touching upon. The closing fact remains that exhibitors and manufacturers alike, look forward to a great season, and as the public does the same, the outlook of the moving picture business for 1910 and 1911 is distinctly brilliant.

Theater—School.

There can be little doubt that the time is fast approaching, even if it has not already arrived, when the great moving picture world must divide itself into two parts. So unexpectedly and exceptionally rapid has been the growth of this new power that it is already beyond the bounds of control as a unit. Its many parts, like children in the home, have outgrown not only their infancy but their surroundings and must needs divide if they would live peaceably and profitably. While continued growth will mean further sub-divisions and other enlargements, the present and immediate call is for the separation of the two natural and predominating forces which have so far asserted themselves: these are the amusing and the educational. Both have met with a warm welcome from an expectant and appreciative public which is demanding more and greater results. The place occupied by the living picture to-day is unique. It is at once on the pivot of the center of interest, yet boundless as the circumference of the earth in its practice and value.

In the amusement world it occupies the "center of the stage" and is holding its own against older and more varied forms of pleasure-giving entertainments, yet it is here that its cosmopolitan nature is commanding greatest attention.

The aid of government is being sought to bring in the law to control and direct it; the church is asking for a moral control and the schools for a supervisory code; moral sponsors and mentors of every class are offering suggestions, varied and impractical as many of them are, it is pleasing to note that all are seeking the best results and none are lamenting its entrance within the circle of present day advances. One has only to visit a moving picture theater to prove that the time has come for a division and classification of the subjects; a strange mixture of drama, comedy, religion and tragedy is unhealthy, produces just criticism; and as oil and water will not mix, neither will the sacred and profane without producing the sacriligious with attendant evil results. A steady diet of "hash" is far from satisfying, and the mind like the stomach requires a more balanced course of food.

A few wise sayings often help to clear an embarrassing situation and here it may with profit be remembered that there is "a time for everything" and "a place for everything," and if everything is "timed" and "placed" according to its rightful demands many a problem may be solved. With this object in view we suggest the first great division in the moving picture world—by a general classification and use of those subjects suitable for the theater and amusement, and those for the school and educational purposes.

It is true that the mission of the moving picture theater is to "entertain and amuse" and this also has its quota of profit in itself, but no one wants either a slice of school or church at such a time or place, any more than one wants a brief interval of a vaudeville in a church service. The first great benefit of this arrangement would be to effectually stop all criticisms and thus take the moving picture out of religious, scholastic and legal strife. A great commercial advantage would inevitably follow this new plan, first, by placing each class of films within a particular sphere of production; and, second, by multiplying the places and purposes of their uses. Religious and educational institutions of every degree and class are without doubt either going to have their own equipment or use such as may be available for that purpose and we cannot but believe that a newer and vaster field is about to open before manufacturers of every kind than has hitherto been supposed.

So enthusiastic have we become over this project that we shall look for its early adoption, doing all in our power to bring it about. Certain authorities have recently been suggesting "municipal ownership" as a remedy for present evils; others are suggesting special places of entertainment for children; each of these plans are impossible and are but vain flounderings of those who wish to force themselves into suggesting remedies.

We are (we trust pardonably so) egotistical enough to believe that the purposes desired will follow the adjustments we are now advocating; it is the "parting of the ways" we have reached in the onward march of a great work. Let us divide, classify and clarify the whole field of living picture work, each division will grow stronger by itself, do its own work and give greater satisfaction.

When this arrangement shall have taken effect we shall have the moving picture theater doing its legitimate work in a true pleasure-giving manner, both exhibitor and public will know what to give and what to expect. In like manner religious and educational subjects will be used in their proper sphere, doing their own work profitably Another strong reason why we advocate this procedure is because we believe something of this nature is sure to happen. We have previously recorded that Milwaukee is advocating church exhibitions; in other places boards of education are considering the possibility of acquiring their own outfits.

In Brooklyn a rabbi and a priest are asking for municipal control and children's theaters. We predicted several weeks ago some such course when we suggested that the moving picture improvements should come from within or they would be forced from without. In pursuance of this policy we advocate the adoption of these improved methods as emanating from the center of the moving picture world rather than anywhere else.

We further look for elevating influences and results, the impure and unworthy will be eliminated and thus the first step will be taken towards putting moving pictures in their right place.

On another page we print two communications in reference to the poster. One writer pillories the sensational poster; the other deprecates the slovenly manner in which both good and bad posters are displayed on some theater fronts. We have a striking example of this on our own "Moving Picture Row" between Broadway and University place. To the plaints referred to we add still another—that of displaying posters having no reference to the picture advertised. A flagrant example recently noticed was a poster showing a man holding a dagger in a threatening attitude over some men seated at a table. This was used to advertise Selig's industrial film, "Opening an Oyster." On asking the exhibitor where the poster applied, he said: "The men at the table are supposed to be eating oysters!" It seems to us that the film manufacturers have the right to prohibit the use of any posters other than those which are supplied by or have been approved by themselves.

The withdrawal of "Kinemacolor" after a long and highly successful season at the Palace Theater, London, may be taken by an appreciative public as being only the first step towards a more ambitious presentation of the Urban-Smith art of natural color kinematography in London in the not distant future. It had long been agreed that it was impossible within the limits of a twenty-minute "turn" to do justice to the aim and scope of so fascinating a subject as life-motion scenes in Nature's veritable hues; but the future arrangements, when announced in the press, will, it is believed, be deemed worthy of this popularized science by which knowledge is presented attractively, simply and chromatically.

Congratulations to the genial Tom Quill, of moving picture poster fame, on the birth recently of a son.

By Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

I wonder how many of my readers feel the picture; think the picture, first, last and all the time; breakfast; lunch; dine with the picture; sleep with the picture; dream of the picture. In other words, are sincere picture men with a sentimental interest in it. Enthusiasts in other callings so immerse themselves therein, that they are regarded, more or less, as zealots or cranks. Let me illustrate what I mean. In the world of sport, when a man catches the golf disease he places the cure of, or therefor, outside the sphere of practicality. He has the golf sentiment. Sentiment, as we all know, whether it applies to love, war, or other pre-occupations of this life, takes possession of man even to his marrow. I do not know that this is a strongly orthodox definition of what sentiment is, but anybody who is an enthusiast and who happens to read these lines, will, I am sure, understand it.

Sentiment, therefore, is one of the causes of, or instigations to, success. Unless you catch the sentiment of that of which you are in pursuit, success can never come to you in the most thorough and satisfactory manner. Success without the propelling motive of sentiment can only at best be perfunctory. If I had not got the sentiment of the scribe thoroughly well soaked into me, I'll be hanged if I should be such a highly successful scribe as I am; eh, friends?

The sentiment of the picture does not seem to be so rife in the moving picture field, as I for one would like to see it. It is rare indeed that you meet anybody associated with this branch of work who seems to love the picture for itself—another definition of sentiment. Many of those who are engaged in the commercial production of moving pictures, in their renting, and in their exhibition, have no sentimental feeling towards the picture whatsoever. For aught they care the picture might be brick or bread, butter or beer, tobacco or beef. Mere commodities for making money. Amongst those who are making pictures right here in this country I can pick out some who are possessed by the sentiment of the picture. I can also pick out those who have no sentiment towards it. In the former case success seems to, nay, is, rewarding their efforts. In the latter, whilst success is temporarily attending their commercial exploitation of the picture as marketable goods, it is as sure as the rising of to-morrow's sun that that success is not likely to continue indefinitely.

The latter class are not picture men in the proper sense of the term. That is to say, they have no love for the picture as such; they have not studied its genesis; they are indifferent as to what is to become of it, so long as for the time being they are making money out of it. I should be considered horribly personal no doubt if I took the last number of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, ran through the list of advertisers who make pictures, separated them under two heads; picture men, and non-picture men. It would surprise the reader to learn how few, according to my definition, would come under the former heading.

I may be wrong, I may be drawing too fine a distinction, I may conceivably be regarded as entirely a sentimental idiot in this matter. Even so, I feel that I am right. Even so, I feel that any man who has charge of the moving picture manufacturing business must, in order to succeed, love the picture for what it is, namely, a beautiful combination of technique and artistry. By artistry I mean pictorial composition, good staging, good acting, good producing, and all the rest of it. I am often chided for my use of uncommon words, but "artistry" is the only word that occurs at the moment as conveying my meaning and entirely fitting the requirements of a concise definition. A man who has the sentiment of the picture will, I imagine, act pretty much in this manner. As he walks along the streets of a crowded city, say New York, he will find himself pausing, watching a group of people or the movement of life generally and saying to himself: "Gee, what a fine picture that would look on the screen." Or, again, he might find himself in the country looking upon the landscape, and would mentally remark: "That would be a fine setting for a picture." Or he might see an old house; a beautiful interior; he might be regarding a specially fine piece of acting either on the stage or off—the uppermost sentiment would be: How well that would look in a picture. Or, again, some particular tone or color in art or nature would strike him; a moonlight effect, a sunset, an effect of tones, or contrast of light and shade. Here, again, your true picture man would find himself saying: That is the sort of stuff I would like to get in my pictures.

Equally so, if, or when, he looks at the great paintings or engravings in the shop windows or galleries, he would say to himself: "That is how I would like my picture to look." In fact, to shorten this little disquisition, your true picture man would live in, by, and for the picture. In so doing assuredly he would at least make an artistic and technical success of his work, the sale of which would then become a matter of business in the proper hands. You see, reader, I myself am one of those who love the picture for itself, and for what it is and must be. Just the same I used to love ordinary photography through which I ploughed from the wet collodion stage to the pictorial stage. All through this phase of my life I felt photography, I had the sentiment of it. It took possession of me to the exclusion of a great deal else in life. The result was that, so far as it went, I made a success of it, just as, of course, other men have also made successes of it.

Now comes another phase in my life, which has all the charm of novelty and freshness. I have something of the feeling of the missionary in persuading or endeavoring to persuade picture men, so-called and self-styled, that there is more in the moving picture than they seem to be aware of. More, that is, than a mere haphazard photograph, carelessly developed and giving a black and white positive of a haphazard subject, haphazardly treated. As I feel in this matter, so does the educated public feel. At present the educated public, and by educated public I mean people of some culture and intelligence, is not seriously treating the moving picture to any large extent, because, generally speaking, the moving picture makers are themselves not treating the moving picture seriously—they have not got the sentiment of it. But if they will get the sentiment, then the public will, I am sure, rise to the occasion and look upon the picture as it looks upon other manifestations of graphic art, such as painting, etching, pencil and pen drawings.

The moving picture maker who is thoroughly imbued with the sentiment of his subject will not send out a picture, unless it is a work of art. "O si sic omnes."

Washington and the Picture.

By A Correspondent.

[The author of the appended article is a well-known authority on photographic art and has had some acquaintance with moving picture matters. While not necessarily indorsing his strictures, yet we feel that they are deserving of publication in our columns, inasmuch, as they represent the views of an educated man quite competent to pass an opinion. The WORLD is never indifferent to competent opinion from outside sources, on the picture and the method of its exhibition, as by giving space to the views of educated people on this matter, we feel that we are furthering the cause of picture progress.—Ed.]

The two most remarkable things to be found in the City of Washington, as far as motion pictures are concerned, are the facts that you have to hunt the city over with a fine tooth comb to find a really high-class picture, and the exhibition of licensed and independent film under the same roof, in the Arcade.

The first statement will draw down the wrath of every owner and operator on my devoted, if anonymous, head, but while anything but a motion picture expert, I know enough of the game to know that the more expert the jury called in to confute me, the more positive my vindication. There are, now and then, good pictures, in this city, but the general rule is a dancing one which is trying on the eyes, poor business for the man who permits it and a libel on the company which made the film.

For instance, and to be particular. There is a syndicate or trust or combination, or other business arrangement, whereby four of the down town picture theaters are run under one management. These are the Pickwick, the Palace, the Colonial and the Cosmos.

Leaving the Cosmos out of the question for the time being, it being a vaudeville and picture house, and confining attention to the three exclusively picture houses of this group, it will be found that, if one starts at the Palace, goes next to the Pickwick and ends at the Colonial, a crescendo scale of picture jumpiness is presented. The picture jumps up and down and it jumps sidewise, and as all the pictures are small rather than oversize, one is led to wonder why the management, which boasts loudly on its program that nothing has been left undone to make these the most attractive shows in the city, doesn't pay a little more attention to mechanics and less to appearances! No, I refuse to say, not knowing, whether the fault is in the operator, the films or the machines. But as all three houses have jumping pictures, as all three show the best films from the leading manufacturers, one is inclined to think it is the machines, which either need repair or scraping.

Ventilation is good in all three of these houses. Decoration is quiet and pleasing. Seats are comfortable, aisles are broad and the shows, if short (two reels) are the best quality—Biograph, Selig, Pathe, etc., and new stuff —no rainy old film. But to see a magnificent Biograph, example of all that is best in photography in the moving picture, wiggling around on the screen like a picture with St. Vitus dance is disgusting.

This condition one finds all too generally here, where the bulk of the patronage comes from Washington people who, probably, never saw any better pictures elsewhere. Anything goes. The picture can jump, it can be skated through so fast that people walking, run, and people, running, gallop. I saw a cracked condenser—or rather, its image, at the Palace. Anything goes. Get 'em in, rush 'em through, get 'em out again. Rents are high, time is fleeting, houses small, if they don't fill up and empty, faster than normal, there isn't a big enough dividend. Yet this syndicate plumes itself upon the attractiveness of its houses.

As for the Arcade. The Arcade is the result of clever politics of the Capital Traction Company, which runs half the street cars in this city. They had a large, substantial, handsome car barn at 14th and Park Road—top o' the hill in Mt. Pleasant, residence section.

New subdivisions and more money in prospect forced the railway to extend the 14th street line two miles further out. Result, one new car barn, and one old one, no good to any one. So the company persuaded certain men with more money than brains to buy the building and remodel it for an amusement resort. There was to be "millions in it" though any sane person knows you can't run an amusement resort of top heavy size in an uptown residence neighborhood. However, they tried it. Among other attractions—and the only one which didn't promptly starve to death, was the Arcade moving picture theater—to many minds, one of the most attractive in Washington—so attractive, in fact, that it is jammed every night, all the evening, in spite of the fact that one must enter the building, walk up stairs and down a long hall. When you arrive, however, you will find a real little theater, unusually attractive because it is without decoration entirely. The plaster modelling of the proscenium arch, and the white panels on the walls are their own decorations, which have given the place the nickname of the "White Theater."

Here, on what is alleged to be the Corona Screen, you will find one new and two old releases nightly—three full reels for a nickel. Projected well, they are, too, although lately, since some stockholders have taken to relieving the operator—cause, unknown, but probably because he wanted a vacation and "any one can turn the crank, you know"—there have been sundry long waits and some impatience on the part of the audience. But the picture usually stands reasonably still and is seldom run through too fast. It is a great place for women and children and one is bound to say in justice to the management that objectionable films are never shown.

Now comes the funny part. Upstairs, still another flight, is a huge room, called the ball room, run as a dance hall, of the entirely respectable variety, during the winter. Here, if you please, are now a couple of hundred folding chairs, although the regulations of this city distinctly provide for chairs fastened down, a screen which would give a third-rate east side show the creeps to look at, an iron box with what seems to be a fifth hand projection machine in it, doing its little best to make the independent releases worse than they really are.

Downstairs the alleged Corona screen is streaky and spotty—two more coats of paint are needed on it, badly. But it is a dream of perfection compared to the screen upstairs, when it isn't so wrinkled that one absolutely cannot read projected print, is so smeared up with aluminum or other metallic paint as to put into the picture lights and shades which never were on sea or land.

As for jumping around—never was there a grasshopper which had anything on these pictures. Poor Imp. Poor Bison. Poor New York Motion Picture Co.! Some of the films they put out are—well not quite in the class of Biograph, Essanay, Selig, Kalem, don't you know? And when you put an idiotic story on a poor screen, through the medium of badly underdone and overcooked photographs, with a machine which jumps around a foot or more at a jump, why you don't get a very good entertainment for your nickel.

The result, of course, is that there are never more than fifty people sitting around, and wishing they hadn't come!

Now, then, are these two shows, under one roof, one over the other, run by the same people? If they are, isn't the Independent outfit putting one over on the licensed manufacturers?

No, I don't know a thing about it. I do know that the man who is apparently manager of the downstairs theater—the "White Theater"—and who is a clerk in the Pension Office in the day time, told me twice, on two different occasions, that the show upstairs and his show were "under one management." If it is, its a mighty poor management, for the overflow alone from the "White Theater" would pay the upstairs show, if they only put on a decent show.

Now, gently, Mr. Independent. I don't accuse you of all the fault. Sometimes you put out a reasonably well-taken film with a first-class story. More often you don't, but that is another tale. But the best of films wouldn't pay in a place where they jump so you can't read them or see expressions, and upon a screen which isn't fit even for song slides—and that is saying something!

With a good film service, a new screen—and plain white cloth would be a vast improvement over this—a new machine or some new parts, an operator who wouldn't "skate 'em through" too fast and a little advertising, this show could be made to pay.

One cannot well leave this Arcade mix up without paying one's respects to the two pianists. Downstairs we hear the same old thing night after night. Upstairs we have a player who can improvise, and who does so, to great effect, especially during a comedy, as, for instance, the Itala Cannon Duel, which is a near-funny film capable of being played to with quite a good deal of effect, by a good pianist. One can't help saying, either, that there is an alleged string band around the corner taking care of a roof garden, also part of the Arcade, and that if you don't like to listen to the good pianist, you can listen to the strings—or you can listen to both at the same time—an ear to each. It must be discouraging to play to a picture under such conditions but then, it probably pays just the same as if there were no band thrown in to worry the player.

As for the films—well, criticism of films is a thankless job and profits no one, much. Yet there is so much which ought to be different, which isn't. I saw a picture, which was an Indian drama, in which an archery contest takes place. The toy bows used by these Indians were guaranteed not to hurt their arms with the strain, and the lady-like way they all shot, reminded one of the old archery clubs and the beginners. It apparently never occurred to the producing manager that there might be a right and a wrong way to shoot a bow and arrow or that any one would see anything incongruous in a toy bow in the hands of a stalwart Indian brave.

There was a Western drama, capable of much effect if it had been handled well. And I grant that, for studio scenery, they made a success of it, but alternating scenes in the suburbs about Philadelphia and labeled "out west" and painted backgrounds with salt all over the place for snow does not make for reality. One is inclined to hope that this, and several other offenders, will abandon the studio for outdoor scenes, as have the biggest and best of the producers. They don't mix, and pictures which don't mix cannot tell a connected story, no matter how good the idea of the story may be.

And, Oh, these actors—these too much actors! In an effort to portray without words, they are overdoing the pantomime. No man in his sober senses, falling in love at first sight, grips his stomach and yanks at himself—nor does he lift his shoulders as high as they can go and drop them a foot to express despondency. The average pretty girl, when you tell her you are in love with her, doesn't squint first heavenward, then at the floor and try to swallow the bosom of her gown. "Breathing impassioned fire down the back of her neck" was exploded as a means of lovemaking in the old tank drama. Why, Mr. Producer, sanction it now? We can't have words in a motion picture—all the more reason for some pretense at naturalness in the acting.

As for the actor or actress who frankly gestures to the camera—!

Well! Its my debut to this audience, and I haven't written any thing pleasant about any one. But having seen real projection, and real entertainment, in other cities, in motion picture houses, I want to see it in my home town. Perhaps if I can stir up a little hornet's nest, I may get it—at least as much of it as is contained in a machine which doesn't jump a ten-foot picture any more than did that at Coney Island jump the forty-foot picture of the fight.

And speaking of the fight—no, space is all gone. They won't let us have the fight here, anyway—unless some motion picture theater owner goes to court about it and make the commissioners show cause as to how and by what right they interdicted it. It's strange it hasn't been done, but there is always hope, some manager will wake up, whether to the way he is being "done" by the commissioners of the District, the way his operator is spoiling his trade or the way his house could be improved with a little business advice.

Bad as things may be, there is always hope. Let us, then keep on hoping—it doesn't cost anything!

PICTURES TO TEACH THE MUTES.

At the Mutes' World's Convention, Colorado Springs, Col., August 6-13, plans were discussed for utilizing the moving picture in providing educational and religious instruction as well as entertainment. A fund was raised for starting the project and providing for special lectures by Prof. E. M. Gallaudet, president of the College for the Deaf, at Washington, D. C. These lectures will be filmed and distributed all over the world.

A GOOD LECTURE.

The lecture on the "Pilgrim Fathers," which has been heard at Keith & Proctor's Fourteenth Street Theater this week deserves more than the usual meed of praise. Very many confuse the Pilgrims with the Puritans. Indeed, so thorough a student of American history as Theodore Roosevelt did that upon one important occasion. It is well, therefore, that a popular lecture upon this topic has been prepared and is now being delivered to audiences.

The slides, too, are excellent, giving many illustrations of scenes connected with the Pilgrims not commonly known, together with excellent reproductions of some of the greatest paintings of striking episodes in the life of these pioneers.

To point out that Provincetown and not Plymouth was the original landing place is in the interest of accuracy in historical research and work. Indeed, the whole lecture deserves credit for its excellence. The mechanical work on the slides is of the best. Some of the reproductions being from different subjects that are remarkably well done.

PICTURE PERSONALITIES

MISS MILLER.

As our readers know we are always glad to include in our gallery of picture personalities, examples drawn from the fair sex. Under the refining influences of women the picture is bound to advance yet further in public favor. Miss Miller is an Australian cousin. She is the daughter of that Mr. Miller, who is the Melbourne partner of our friend, Mr. T. J. West, the picture king: the largest exhibitor in the world, whom we included in our gallery of Picture Personalities last May. Having spent some fourteen months in London, studying the picture in its business aspects, Miss Miller is now on her way home to Melbourne, Australia, for the purpose of taking an active part in the business there. The young lady is a great traveler. She has been in many parts of the world and has gathered up a varied and valuable store of experience. She is not particularly impressed by the somewhat perfunctory manner in which the picture is treated in New York City. But then, nobody is. She is, however, to visit Chicago where she may have cause to modify and maybe change her opinion as to the way things are done there.

Miss Miller confirms what was said by Mr. West and several other Australian visitors, who have come to the office of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, during this year, in that the picture at the Antipodes is shown in the most dignified manner to the accompaniment of beautiful music. The result is that in Australia the picture show is patronized by the best classes of people, who are exceedingly fond of American subjects. The American picture or rather the American-made picture apparently leads all the rest.

Our fair visitor is bright, alert, vivacious and intelligent. Being still very young, the world (the moving picture world) is all before her, where to choose. We have no doubt that on her return to her native land the experiences she has gained on her travels will enable her to play a leading part as one of Australia's foremost picture women.

MR. H. G. PLIMPTON.

It is said that the hour brings the man. In other words that there is no crisis in life without the man being at hand to settle it. In the picture end of the Edison Manufacturing Company's business, the hour brought the man in the person of Mr. H. G. Plimpton, some eighteen months ago, when he took charge of the great studio out in the Bronx, where most of the Edison negatives are made and where all of them are developed. Concurrently with Mr. Plimpton's appearance on the scene, in the capacity of manager of the negative branch of the Edison Company, many people shook their heads. Human nature is too prone to shake its head at unknown, untried men. But from the moment we met Mr. Plimpton, we never faltered in our opinion, that he would succeed in his self-declared object: that of making the Edison moving picture the best in the world. So he has. The other day when we were out at the Bronx studio, we congratulated our victim, whose portrait is given on this page, on having become a thorough "film man," for good and all.

It is sufficient to summarize the record of the Edison Company's progress during Mr. Plimpton's short managerial career up in the Bronx, to gain a sight of the work in which he has borne a part. An Edison picture to-day in our eyes is faultless in technique. Then, again, it is clean, convincing and, as a rule, cheerful in theme. Of course, you cannot assure that in the moving picture drama the sombre aspects of life shall be avoided. Life is a matter of lights and shadows, ups and downs, contrast and changes. If you essay to depict the drama of life on a moving picture screen, it is inevitable that you must show some of the shadows as well as some of the lights. But you need not unduly dwell upon the morbid, the melancholy and the morose. You can point the moral that, after all, life, when properly lived, is not half a bad thing in its way. You can avoid the prurient, the salacious and the risque in your picture stories. That's what the Edison Company is doing to-day. Other manufacturers, we regret to observe, are vacillating between the sombre and the slightly suggestive. Not so the Edison Company, whose policy stands for brightness and cleanliness, as witness that exceedingly dainty little "Alice in Wonderland" picture, which we saw up in the Bronx the other day.

A hundred and fifty scenarios a week pass under Mr. Plimpton's eyes. Roughly, about 2 per cent. of these productions are suitable for use. Most scenarios submitted to the film makers, are as we know by actual experience, painfully amateurish things. Can it be wondered, therefore, that the Edison Company have sought the assistance of such tried and practiced hands as those of Rex Beach, Richard Harding Davis, C. F. Townsend, Carolyn Wells ond others. Having for many years suffered under the persecutions of the illiterate amateur scribler, we are surprised that all the other manufacturers don't follow the lead of the Edison Company in this respect and turn down the stupid outside scenario writer. Of course, as opposed to this idea, is the suggestion that it is the duty of, or to the interest of, the film maker to try and discover new talent. All sorts of equally absurd things are said about scenarios, their writers and readers. New talent discovers itself. Film makers are not philanthropists. They know what they want and buy what they want. That's all that's to it.

It is trite to say that the Edison dramatic staff is one of the finest in the world and that the name of Pilar Morin will ever be honorably associated with recent Edison work. It is hard to conjecture what direction the future policy of the Edison Company will take in picture making. Time alone can settle this. But of the nature of that policy there can be no doubt. For Mr. Plimpton talks quality and talks it sincerely, with an understanding of what quality really means, namely, technical and artistic quality. It amuses us at times to hear picture men talk and write quality without knowing the meaning of this much abused word. It is the merest truth to say that the subject of the portrait on this page, thoroughly understands what quality means in the moving picture. He is determined to have the Edison picture qualitatively unexcelled and pleasingly varied in theme and treatment. The prevalence of a similar spirit throughout the business would materially advance it in public esteem.

PRIZE FIGHT PICTURES LEGAL.

The anxiously awaited opinion of the law advisers of Governor Hughes is now issued and fully reprinted herewith so that our readers may know it in detail:

Albany, August 20.—The Attorney-General, in a decision made to-day, holds that exhibitions of the Jeffries-Johnson fight scenes films do not offend public decency in the sense in which those words are used in the Penal Code, and that they do not constitute an immoral exhibition or show.

"If, however," says the opinion, "such exhibitions, as a matter of fact, tended to arouse race prejudice or to instigate any considerable number of persons to deeds of violence, they would, of course, become public nuisances as endangering the comfort, repose and safety of the community and would be violative of the penal law.

"I have not overlooked the public policy of this State as declared in Section 1710 of the penal law, prohibiting the holding of prize fights within this State, nor those decisions in several other States in which it is held that the giving of a prize fight could not be enjoined on the ground that it is a public nuisance. But, in my opinion, there is a difference in the effect upon spectators of an actual prize fight and the mere visual representation of such a contest."

In the first place it will be readily seen that the opinion first given by Mayor Gaynor is fully justified, with two such sane and safe men like the Mayor of New York City and the Governor of New York State, the opinion of many self-constituted and inflated authorities bursts like a bubble. The most marvelous duplicity of the New York Journal in bringing this anti-prize fight to a head now gets an unenviable exposure. Editor Brisbane must feel this "body blow" for thrice last week he published the statement that Governor Hughes had "condemned the fight pictures," a statement as equally deceitful as the "great mass meeting" in Cooper Union, when in a building holding several thousands only about three hundred people were present and the whole "demonstration" a "fizzle."

The editorial, "The Journal's fight against the prize fight pictures supported by Governor Hughes," will now have to go in the waste paper basket and the unmasked hypocrite will have to look for some other "virtue" to parade before the public. It is worth while recording that in addition to its many ways of advertising the actual fight at Reno, the Journal of July 3 advised its readers who happened to be at Coney Island on the Fourth that they had made special arrangements to keep a continuous bulletin in "Dreamland" so that the progress of the fight might be minutely followed.

Now that prize fighting is being universally tabooed, the Journal is making campaign capital out of it, so that in the event of any effective legislation they can claim the credit for it. Although now the question is practically settled, suffice it to say that if prize fighting seemed popular the Journal would be the first to champion its cause.

There are two points in the Attorney-General's decision worthy of note; first, that no evil results have followed the showing of the pictures, no "race prejudice" has been aroused and "no acts of violence incited." It is also worthy of note that not the least of the evils predicted by the moral agitators has occurred, to say nothing of the greater evils they affirmed would overrun the land. In the second place the Attorney-General differentiates between "a visual representation" and the actual contest; precisely that statment was made in an article on the pictures in thesecolumns when it was shown that the exhibition of the pictures did not provoke more than ordinary enthusiasm. The outcome of this "hue and cry" shows plainly that there are sufficient laws to deal with such necessities as they arise, and further, that judicious executive officers are at the head of affairs and "the country is safe." Moral agitators are a nuisance; the clergy and the church must always be listened to and respected; the views of their representative men must have weight, but irresponsible little known critics should learn that if they jump into the limelight they incur the suspicion of being "notoriety seekers" and before they are aware "calamity howlers," even if backed or supported in any way by a newspaper gives them neither standing nor authority. Now that their "words have fallen to the ground" and "none of those things happened" which they predicted, it becomes a question at this moment if the quiet public judgment has not dealt with this picture question better than the self-appointed censors and judges; at any rate the matter seems to be evolving itself in a most satisfactory manner.

PICTURES IN SMALL TOWNS.

Sometimes when one sits in the New York theaters and sees really meritorious pictures pass without the slightest indication of appreciation one wonders where the emotions of the people can be. Frequently New York audiences will not display any emotion, no matter how good the picture is, or what it represents.

The writer dropped into a show in a small town the other night just to see what they were doing there. The first picture on the program was "The Russian Spy." The projecting apparatus was so far superior to that usually employed in a small town that it deserves special commendation. This picture ran perfectly steady. Much of the way not the slightest tremor could be detected. It was given the closest attention throughout, and at the end, when the firing squad, which is about to shoot the girl, was driven away there was hearty applause. Perhaps they could be pardoned for not enthusing much over the picture as a whole. It is rather gloomy, yet has sufficient excuse for existence in the information it conveys.

The next was "Tropical Java" (Urban-Eclipse), a very fine piece of scenic work. Considering the difficulty of the subject it is a really remarkable photograph. The writer heard Burton Holmes lecture on Java, with slides and motion pictures, and this film so far surpasses his that there is no comparison. This picture was watched in its turn with close attention.

Then came a song. The less said about that the better. It was not in any sense an addition to the program and could as well be left out. A good song would be an addition, but this was not worth the time it took from the program.

Then came the Vitagraph's lively comedy, "Twa Hieland Laddies." The writer first saw this funny picture in New York and despite its humor there was not a smile, much less a laugh. But here there was a roar from the time they entered the recruiting station and signed the rolls until they marched in front, the pride of the regiment. And without doubt the audience would have stood for it again.

The fourth reel was Lubin's "Adopted Daughter." There was a good deal of sympathy expressed for the unfortunate girl and much rejoicing ensued when she was finally taken away from her cruel foster parents.

The program consisted of these four reels and a song for 10 cents, and the theater is packed from its opening at 3 o'clock in the afternoon until 11 o'clock at night. Some of the time even standing room is at a premium. The proprietor has the exclusive license in a town of over 15,000 people. Others have applied, but have been refused. The town would stand one more good theater. It is a community where the best people go and only the best show would pay at all.

The proprietor is increasing his revenue some by throwing the pictures of candidates for local offices on the screen. It is a good means of advertising for them and helps out his revenue at the same time. I might add that The Moving Picture World is a regular and welcome visitor to this theater.

B. H. A.

THOSE POSTERS.

Considerable comment has been made of late through various channels in regard to the use of posters by moving picture exhibitors, and in a great many instances the scathing criticism directed toward them has not been undeserved. It is an undeniable fact that posters are an excellent advertising medium, but, like every other advertising medium, they must be used with judgment. Yes, and sincerity as well. Sincere publicity is never devoid of results but if a man is making a statement in his advertising which he himself does not believe, how long does he suppose any one else will believe it? And that is just what the exhibitor is doing who hangs out a poster describing or portraying a scene from one film and then exhibits another; or still worse, shows a poster that has no connection with any film whatsoever. When your patrons fail to see the connection between the posters and the film you are displaying they will not make any audible comment, but nine cases out of ten they will make a mental note of it, and thereafter you may as well hang your posters in your cellar, for they will have just as much effect there as in your lobby.

I am not trying to discourage the use of posters; on the contrary, am heartily in favor of them and especially during the approaching Fall and Winter months. In a very short time the regular theaters will open their doors for the season and naturally their offerings will attract many of the regular patrons of the moving picture theater. And right now the exhibitor should be hard at work devising ways and means to successfully meet this competition by advertising.

Perhaps you have considered the use of posters, but the recent criticisms have made you rather undecided as to just how and when to use them. Here is where I want to give you a bit of well meant advice: "Use posters, but use them judiciously." First of all, don't use a poster that has no connection with the film you are running. For your own sake, and for the sake of the business, don't. Don't paste or tack the posters on your sign board in front of the theater and then chalk a half dozen lines around it, describing the poster. If the poster is of any value at all pictorially it will tell its own story quicker and more effectively than any fifty lines you can chalk around it. As to the use of posters pasted on canvas and hung up like a banner in front of a side show you surely need no instruction, for they are positively hideous to say the least. There is only one effective way to advertise with the aid of posters and that is to buy a neat, suitable frame, place it on an easel in your lobby or some attractive show window of a store, if you can get permission to do so, and place within this frame the posters that faithfully portray scenes of the film which you are advertising. Change them for every release, and above all, keep them clean. Perhaps when you read the last sentence you will say to yourself, "that all sounds very well, but it is impossible for my exchange sends me posters that are already soiled and I must use them or not at all." Nothing of the sort. Perhaps you are one of the many that have been paying the exchanges for the use of posters, which you return with the film, and which are used time and time again by other exhibitors. If you are, it's about time you are changing your methods. Don't pay rental for the use of any poster, but, if you feel that you must get your posters through your exchange, buy them outright. Don't rent a poster that has mud and dirt from seven different States spattered over it before it reaches you. No wonder the use of posters has been criticised.

Posters can be purchased singly from most any agency for ten cents apiece, or from the film manufacturers. All the manufacturers have a plan whereby you can receive posters for twelve different releases for a very nominal sum, and these posters are usually sent to you a week in advance of the release. The latest innovation of the manufacturers is that they are having posters made direct from one of the scenes of the film, or from the original photos, and are printed in four colors instead of two as heretofore. The manufacturers must purchase these posters in large quantities, so as to be able to procure a low price, and when they are sold to you at the price they are the manufacturers are not making a profit; on the contrary, when the cost of mailing, etc., is taken into consideration, they are not so much as "breaking even." And they are well aware of it, yet they realize that by supplying you with artistic posters, instead of cheap, gaudy stock lithos, that they will be benefited in the long run, and it is a foregone conclusion that you will be.

When a manufacturer is spending hundreds of dollars a week so as to be able to supply you with posters, and at such a low cost to you, it appears to me that the most reasonable thing for you, Mr. Exhibitor, is to buy the posters direct. Work in conjunction with the manufacturers through your exchange and you can do more for the moving picture business than all the written suggestions ever could. The manufacturers are doing all in their power to keep the pictures free from criticism, so it's up to you to do the same with your advertising methods. In concluding I wish to repeat, when you use posters, use real posters, place them in a frame, keep them clean; and instead of drawing criticism, you will find that they will invite the dimes to your cash drawer.

AN ONLOOKER.

[In connection with "Onlooker's" remarks anent the poster, we publish the following letter from an exhibitor as it contains a hint to manufacturers; or at least their publicity agents. We have, ourselves, often felt regret that the most sensational scene was often selected to posterize a film, and the imagination was often drawn upon by the artist if the picture was not sensational enough. We are glad to know that exhibitors, for whose use these posters are intended, agree with us.—Eds. M. P. W.]

Sandusky, Ohio, August 22, 1910.

Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—I would like a small space in your paper about the lithograph banners that are being sent out by the film makers. If they wish to build up the business it is about time they pay some attention to getting out banners that will appeal to the ladies and children, instead of the blood-curdling scenes where they are holding up knives that a crime has been committed with, and many others that have no meaning. I could name numbers of them if I wished. I enclose a poster of a film put on the market a few days ago and will ask you if you think it a fit banner to draw ladies and children? Yours truly,

CHAS. REARK,

THE POSTER.

Somebody asks: "What is an operator's license?" Go and try to get one and find out. Many hardships have been worked out by rather a stringent enforcement of the naturalization regulations, but that cannot be helped. The examiners say: "We abide by the law."

It seems ridiculous, though, that a young man who does not know how to prove that his father was a citizen of the country should be forced out of the building by a policeman who could not stand the same test.

* * *

The Attorney-General of the State of New York has decided that there is no law prohibiting the exhibition of the Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures. This is what the unfortunate Mayor Gaynor decided with the endorsement of the Corporation Counsel and the practical declaration of Governor Hughes. I am interested in so far as the pictures are concerned. I have claimed from the beginning that any interference would be illegal. One right start was made and that was the stopping of the Kauffman-Lang affair. I really do not know that any attempt would have been made to take pictures of the fight, but I do know that no one was allowed to take the pictures and then be "squeezed."

The Jeffries-Johnson pictures have not been the failure many people suppose. Some hundreds of dollars have been gathered by the promoters; and not a few dollars have been paid in under the cover of society by some people who have tried, or pretended, to point out the brutalities of the affair.

* * *

The popular claim appears to be in favor of the elimination of fights of the fistic variety from the moving pictures. Let the popular voice reign, but let it be heard at the time of the announcements of fights—and not after.

I thought of one thing the other day: How is it that 6,000,000 people are supposed to combat the exhibition of the fight pictures and yet the railroads of the country, controlled by the same people, reaped the harvest from the original event? There are one of two conjectures in this: either the very people who protest against the pictures condoned the original act, or they were asleep. All the world loves a fighter and the same world hates a hypocrite.

I see the fight pictures have been running in a theater on Fourteenth street for the past two weeks and the equilibrium of the universe has not been disturbed. They have also been shown in other parts of the city and many other parts of the country with the same result. Idiocy seems to have given way to fair play. The worst the cranks can say about the fight now is that it was "tame." To prove the consistency of the opposition I quote the following from the Saint Samuel's Almanac:

"In fact there was no objection to their showing the fight pictures and they might as well have invited all of New York society to see them." Quite a change in sentiment, isn't it?

Present indications go to prove that the Paramount Film Company made no mistake in opening a branch office in Washington, D. C. Their advent in the Capitol City has certainly caused a stir among the exhibitors and stronger efforts are being made by the licensed exchanges to hold their trade than ever before. The first house to show the Independent goods of the Paramount Company was the Majestic Theater (1,500 seats) on Pennsylvania avenue. The manager of this theater was very pleasantly surprised and remarked that he did not know the Independents had such good pictures. General Manager Bernstein of the Paramount Company states that as soon as business warrants it, the Washington office will buy the entire output of the Independent manufacturers.

ADVERTISING FOR THE EXHIBITOR.

In advertising his theater, the exhibitor generally finds himself restricted to the use of three or four mediums, and naturally, on account of their limited number, these mediums must be worked to their fullest extent and in the best manner possible. The three mediums most in use are newspapers, posters, and handbills or dodgers. Each of these three has its advantages and disadvantages, and each, in so far as results are concerned, is in a class by itself.

Take newspaper advertising, for instance; in the medium and small sized cities and towns (I might add here that this article is principally for the exhibitor in these towns) the newspaper is an excellent advertising medium, but it is safe to state that the newspaper ad. of your theater will be read mostly by women and children. A good patronage to cater to, but how about the busy man who doesn't care to read the newspaper ads.? Yes, you have your posters in your lobby prominently displayed where every passerby can see them, and they speak for themselves. True enough, but everybody in your city does not pass by the lobby of your theater; and to reach the people who neither read your newspaper ads. or pass your theater, is where the handbill or dodger gets in its work.

When used once or twice a week, and especially for advertising a special program, as a result getter the handbill can't be beat. Take, for example, a manufacturing town. A few boys placed at the exits of a factory at quitting time can place your dodgers in the hands of hundreds of men who never see your newspaper ads. or posters, and you can feel assured that 90 per cent. of them will read the dodger word for word.

Now you are arguing with yourself again, something like this: "They cost too much"; "I can't write the copy for a good bill"; "ought to have cuts to illustrate the text, and I can't get them." Well, this time your arguments are all for naught, for once more the film manufacturers, for your especial benefit and for the good of the business in general, have arranged all the details, so that now, whenever you want handbills or dodgers, they are quickly available, and at a very reasonable price. Arrangements have been made with Hennegan & Co., Cincinnati, Ohio, whereby dodgers can be obtained for any release. These dodgers obviate the necessity of your writing copy or furnishing cuts, for this house illustrates every handbill or dodger with cuts appropriate to the text, and they describe the releases in an attractive and interesting manner.

The Hennegan Company is furnishing a very suitable and convenient size, 8 x 11 inch, 4-page (5½ x 8 inch) handbill, for the ridiculously low price of $2.00 per thousand for the first thousand, and $1.75 per thousand thereafter. All you need to do is send the money, stating for which release you desire to use the printing, and they will be in your hands, with name of your theater, date, etc., printed on first page, ready for distribution in about the time you would ordinarily take to plan a bill. These heralds are carefully gotten up, nicely illustrated, and well written by an advertising man who has had long experience in the show business. When you want to advertise with handbills or dodgers, try this new idea, and the chances are that once more you'll feel grateful to the manufacturers for their solicitousness of the moving picture business and the welfare of the exhibitors. As for results, they are sure to come.

This firm has also inaugurated a new idea, which is proving quite profitable to the exhibitors fortunate enough to use same. For each association release, they print one-sheets in the largest possible type (12 to 30-inch letters) the name of the subject and manufacturer. This gives the exhibitor an opportunity to use two styles of posters with each reel, and many of them prefer the large type poster to the lithographs now being furnished. They sell these at four cents each. Many theaters are using these one-sheets in the center of a nicely bordered three-sheet board with good results. The Magnetic Film Service Company are distributing these to their customers, and they are delighted with the results.

THE SALES MANAGER OF THE POWERS MACHINE.

H. B. COLES.

The picture business has many phases, the study of each and every one of which enables one to form an opinion on the condition of things. For example, there is the projector end of matters. H. B. Coles, the esteemed representative of the Nicholas Power Company, has recently returned from a long trip to the Far West, in the interests of his company, and those, of course, of the Power's Cameragraph. Mr. Coles reports a most successful trip, from a business point of view. This was only to be expected when one realizes what a beautiful piece of projection mechanism the Power's Cameragraph is. In the course of a long and interesting talk with Mr. Coles we learned that the picture outlook all over the country is exceedingly brilliant. The picture men have recently had a good time and are putting their houses in order for the Fall season. So far from there being any diminution of public interest in the picture, it was Mr. Coles' experience, wherever he went, that it was on the increase, as evidenced by the prosperous condition of the exchanges and theaters. There is a general tendency, in his experience, to pay closer attention to good projection. The exhibitors more and more realize that they must show a good picture; and that in order to show a good picture an efficient projector in competent hands is essential. Hence the great success Mr. Coles met with the Power's Cameragraph on his trip, which extended through practically every State in the Union, enabling him to see, in his own words, "something of his own country." In such able hands as those of Mr. Coles the Power's Cameragraph is bound to acquire added popularity by having its many valuable features lucidly and convincingly explained and demonstrated.

Of exceedingly timely interest to exhibitors all over the country is a news item to the effect that the Levi Co., Inc., makers of slides at 24 Union Square, New York City, have made special arrangements with the American Press Association whereby they will reproduce on slides all events of special interest. They will have slides in a few days of Col. Roosevelt's Western trip that will be of great interest to exhibitors everywhere. Slides are now ready representing some of the incidents in the attempted assassination of the Mayor of New York and of the recent celebration at Provincetown, Mass. We believe that these slides will be a welcome addition to the programs of all picture houses, showing as they will incidents of general interest from week to week as they appear in the public press.

UNCONSCIOUS HEROISM (Pathe).

The higher development of moving picture art is exemplified to a marked degree in this Pathe film of early release. The story which is unfolded is almost without plot. It is just a pathetic little story of a boy who, during the famous siege of Paris, stole out of the city and crossed the enemy's lines to procure a bottle of milk for his ailing baby brother. The brave youth is captured by the Prussian guards and brought before the colonel, who spares him because he has children of his own at home, and the boy is gallantly escorted in safety beyond the Prussian lines. But Fate is unkind and almost at the gates of Paris he is shot by his own countrymen, but the mistake is discovered and the wounded boy has the satisfaction of fulfilling his mission.

Simple though the story is, it has been worked up with true artistic skill. The play has the master touch of genius and the various emotions are so well acted that subtitles are hardly needed to understand it. This is the kind of picture play that is going to hold the attention of the public, and we are glad to see that Pathe Freres, who are so adept at the mechanical end of matters, are going in for this kind of play. We hope to see more of them.

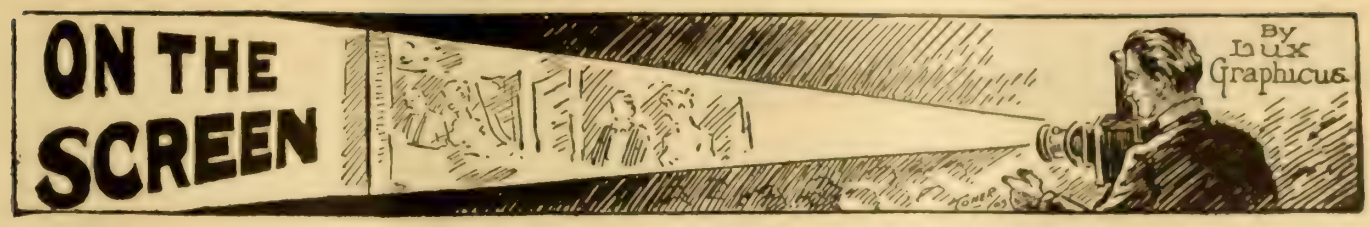
THE BOY HERO IN THE PRUSSIAN CAMP.
Scene from "Unconscious Heroism" (Pathe).



"No man is infallible," said the late Professor Jowett of Oxford, one of the greatest scholars and pedants of last century, "not even the youngest of us." Infallibility is the prerogative of only one man on earth and that in respect of faith and morals. And of course when we come down to the practical aspect of things, he is governed in his decisions by a college or committee of Cardinals, educated ecclesiastics and men of the world, competent by their training and knowledge to give decisions and opinions upon questions of faith or morals. This is a rough and ready definition of Papal infallibility.

"Holy smokes," said a friend to whom I was talking in this vein the other night, "what on earth has this got to do with the moving picture!" Certainly, at first blush, not much. But, as I always take the readers of this page absolutely into my confidence and tell them exactly what passes in my mind from week to week, I feel sure that though they may be somewhat mystified by my opening paragraph, they will have the persuasion that it leads up to something of vital interest in connection with the business and the exhibition of the picture.

Where lies infallibility, in deciding what is right and proper in the moving picture for public exhibition? In the People's Institute Board of Censorship, in the Chicago Censorship, amongst the clergy, the magistracy, or the press or the philanthropic, benevolent and humanitarian societies—are these the custodians of infallibility in respect of the morality of the moving picture? Where, in short, shall we turn for a universally respected decision, as to what is right and what is wrong, in the way of moving pictures for public exhibition?.

Bother it all, Pat Powers! It's you who have forced me into this highly casuistical strain of thought! But it is not even a case of casuistry. Theologians may say that it is one of morality. Anyhow, it is the picture of the handsome lady on page 480 in last week's Moving Picture World that causes me to write as I am writing now. The girl in high boots, tights, bare arms and neck is certainly a very shapely figure—in the characteristic vernacular of the time, "She is a peach." And to think that she is to meander in this attenuated stage garb through several hundred feet of film, for the edification, the amusement, or something else, whatever you may like to imagine, of hundreds of thousands of moving picture theater goers!

Of course in real life burlesque queens don't walk about in stage costume. In real life burlesque queens are very unromantic persons indeed; rather vulgar people, living on beef and beer, and being not too particularly refined. Stage life, circus life, and all the rest of it are not conducive to the exhibition of the finer attributes of human nature. These people are just players, and in playing for a livelihood they are apt to forget that after all they are only just mere men and women. So it has come to pass that players—that is, stage folk—have always been in a class by themselves, ever since the time when Shakespeare and his companions started the business, and William himself wrote the immortal lines beginning, "All the world's a stage."

I was half-way through these paragraphs when an exhibitor friend called upon me, and strongly objected to the production of pictures in which kissing prominently figured. He thought that in the interests of the older people who go to the theaters, the kissing pictures should be eliminated. "Younger people don't understand kissing!" he said. Don't they though! And so do the old ones, in my experience. Here is the question suggested by my friend's observation: Where is the line to be drawn? There is nothing wrong per se in kissing, therefore there cannot be anything wrong in its representation on the moving picture screen. But evidently a line has to be drawn in the subject matter of these pictures. Where shall it be drawn, and who is to draw it? That's the question.

Meanwhile, Mr. Powers' burlesque young lady is immortalized on film. Of course she wouldn't walk down Broadway, New York City, in that garb. If she did, she would be promptly held by a New York cop, you bet! But if it be wrong for her to appear in that guise in the street, is it right for her to appear in a similar guise on the screen, before hundreds of thousands of eyes? I dare say that, as in most affairs of life, much is to be said on both sides.

One of these days we may have Mr. Anthony Comstock invading the moving picture theater and objecting to such pictures as this of the Powers burlesque queen. I don't object. I don't object to the young lady, Diana, right on top of the building in Madison Square, within rifle shot of this building. Some people do, however. They would go along Thirty-fourth street or Twenty-third street, and clothe the young lady in the latest fashionable garments of womankind. That is their method of drawing the line. In other words, in their view of things there is no line to be drawn. They simply say that beauty adorned is adorned the most. Of course, as my educated readers know, in the original line the word reads "unadorned."

I write these paragraphs because the tendency among film makers is to rely upon the portrayal of female beauty, more or less adorned or unadorned, for the success of their pictures. But they can't be too particular in drawing the line. A large volume of public sentiment is still against the pictures. The makers of these films cannot be too particular in their treatment of the female form divine. That which is permissible on the ordinary stage is apparently not yet permissible on the moving picture stage, otherwise we shouldn't have a Board of Censorship for the moving pictures. There is no Board of Censors for the ordinary stage; the result is that the Broadway theaters of New York City can, if they like, put on any number of pieces which are just so many "leg shows"—troops of girls just about as scantily dressed as they well can be. Are we drifting towards the same sort of thing in the moving pictures? If so, where is the line to be drawn and who is to draw it? Will somebody tell me?

RACES ACROSS COUNTRY, BUT BEATEN BY DEATH.

Chas. O. Baumann, of the "Bison" Company, Hurries from California to Bedside of Dying Child.

More pathetic than any scene ever depicted in the picture films of his company was the experience of Charles O. Baumann, secretary and treasurer of the New York Motion Picture Company, who lost in a race with Death across the continent to reach the bedside of his boy Frank, who died on Sunday, August 21.

Mr. Baumann, as we have announced, was in Los Angeles with the "Bison" stock company. The boy had been ailing prior to his departure, but the family physician advised Mr Baumann that in his opinion no serious complications could be expected. Mr. Baumann had only been in California a few days, however, before an unlooked for change for the worse took place in the child's condition.

Telegraphic advice to this effect reached Mr. Baumann on Friday, August 19, and he immediately boarded the California Limited and began the race for home. He reached Chicago Monday noon and arrived in New York on the Twentieth Century Tuesday morning. But Death won and Mr. Baumann can not be consoled with the messages of sympathy that poured in from his many friends.

Mr. Baumann was exceedingly fond of his son, who was fourteen years of age. The interment took place on Thursday. Many beautiful floral pieces were received from sympathetic friends, a great number of whom were present at the funeral.

The Editors of the Moving Picture World take this opportunity of extending to Mr. Baumann and his bereaved family their heartfelt sympathy and that of his many other friends on this sorrowful occasion.

"Willie" (Selig).—He started West at the instance of the girl's father to grow up with the country, as green a tenderfoot as was ever welcomed by the appreciative cowboys. But he acquires knowledge rapidly, and shortly he makes it so interesting for his companions that they quite agree that he is one of them. Then he goes home and claims the girl.

"The Count that Counted" (Essanay).—A lively love story, illustrating the resourcefulness of a reporter and how it was turned to good purpose. The old millionaire, who objected to the reporter, was duped into accepting a supposed count as a son-in-law, and great was his surprise to discover that the reporter had outwitted him after all. This comedy is diverting because it is lively. Human nature, the most interesting of all subjects, is apparent all through it, and the result will meet with the approval of motion picture lovers without distinction. A good comedy, full of life, is to be commended always. And in this instance the actors have risen to the occasion and produced something of unusual merit.

"The Perversity of Fate" (Kalem).—Unquestionably this tale will appeal to many because they will see in it a repetition of facts which have come under their own observation. While love is more often requited than otherwise, there are still very many instances where true hearts go through life bearing a burden they can never escape. Here is one illustration. Dramatically the story is told and the actors work it out sympathetically and earnestly, developing emotion as they proceed. Few can see the picture without being stirred to the heart by the story itself and the suggestions which flow from it. Maybe the suggestions, the recognition of such a possibility, really appeal more strongly than any other feature. Be that as it may, the audience showed clearly that this film struck a responsive chord in the bosoms of most of them and they sympathized with both when they discovered how fate had cheated them.

"A Cheyenne Brave" (Pathe).—An Indian love story with a long chase through picturesque scenery as one feature and a duel between two Indians for another. But the girl's lover wins and, entering their canoe again, they depart for the land of the brave's people. Some interest attaches to a love story of this character because it is a type of the heart stories of all men, but the principal attraction of this story is the beautiful outdoor scenery, so well photographed and reproduced. The story may be needed to afford a reason for the long canoe journey, but there is little in it which appeals strongly to critics of love stories. Beautiful scenery is always interesting, and since the great outdoors became so popular such pictures attract increasing attention.

"The Rival Serenaders" (Urban).—A comedy representing difficulties when rival serenaders take a hand in entertaining. It contains some interesting situations and develops some good comedy features.

"Paris, Seen from the Eiffel Tower" (Urban).—An excellent piece of photography, giving a good idea of how the city of Paris looks from above. The work is clearly done and the operator made the most of his opportunities. While views of cities taken from a height like this are little more than maps, there is a certain fascination that attaches to such views largely, perhaps, because it causes a repetition of the sensations experienced when one is looking down from a considerable elevation. To have Paris at one's feet is sufficiently unusual to be novel. When the work is as admirably done as it is in this instance the attraction is greatly increased.

"When We Were in Our Teens" (Biograph).—A lesson in diplomacy, taught in a humorous way and proving beyond a reasonable doubt that the one who is not diplomatic speedily loses all his hopes in present happiness, or in possibilities for the future. The moral is, if a moral can be said to be concealed about the person of this entertaining picture, do not criticise a girl's paintings, or biscuits, or anything else she does if you want to stand in with her. Having impressed, with some degree of force, this important fact upon the minds of a large number of people, this film may be declared to have proved its right to existence.

"An Old Story With a New Ending" (Biograph).—Often the interest of a story increases in direct ratio with the unexpected features that develop. Here is an old story, so old that it has been hoary with age for lo, these many years. Yet by switching the ending it is given a fresh zest which makes its retelling funny instead of a matter of mourning as it might have been in less capable hands. The girl's note in the overalls seemed all straight, but he didn't exactly expect the information that the girl wanted a man who could afford something beside 47-cent pants. It is an evidence that the girl was sensible and well worth winning. Moreover, it developed a new feature in story termini that should be useful to others who may at some time desire to purloin or repeat an ancient yarn.

"Shorty at the Shore" (Lubin).—All sorts of chases from subways to balloons have been developed by motion picture producers, and each one has some individual comic feature that makes it interesting and laughable. But it has remained for Lubin to reproduce a chase in a roller chair on the boardwalk at Atlantic City which offers novel and extremely laughable features. Shorty, the poor and abused gardener, gets his vacation, through a clever hoax, but when the deception is discovered trouble begins, and only for the episode of the roll chair Shorty's situation would have been perilous. The comedy is bright and sparkling and should prove an attractive addition to any program.

"Her Winning Way" (Melies).—A comedy which has all the dash and go which are usually inseparable from a comedy produced by this house. It might, perhaps, be said that suggestions are concealed in the obvious humor which might be discouraging to those who come under the spell of a similar winning way. Of course observations of this character may be altogether superfluous, yet they may, under certain circumstances, be more or less poignant.

"Human Hearts" (Selig).—A drama in which the Selig players have seized the opportunity and have developed a notable film. The very name is suggestive and the film itself fully sustains whatever emotions may have been suggested by the name. Probably the human heart is the least understood of all created things, and this picture plays upon the emotions with a sincerity and force which cannot be resisted.

"How the Squire Was Captured" (Edison).—A sparkling comedy full of humorous situations. It relates how the old squire, seriously smitten with a pretty girl, is unable to get her, but he is consoled with a maiden aunt of uncertain age. The laughable manner in which the squire is taken bodily into camp will supply entertainment for a pleasant half hour. The story is well told and admirably photographed, and the picture is replete with the numerous complicated and funny situations which contribute to its attractiveness.

"Bumptious Takes Up Automobiling" (Edison).—The story of Bumptious has been entertainingly told in his various escapades. The latest is a worthy addition to the lively series. The latest and funniest adventures of the stout and self-important gentleman are too good to be described. The picture must be seen to acquire an adequate conception of what he does and what happens to him. Suffice it to say, after this picture is seen there will be a vast change in your opinion of the sport of automobiling.

"A Short Lived Triumph" (Pathe).—A comedy which effectively tells the story of one who believed himself sufficiently sure of his ground to prevent difficulties. However, as is graphically shown, his triumph is short lived and his experiences furnish a good laugh for any audience. The comedy is well told and the acting is satisfactory.

"The Eriks" (Pathe).—A comedy in which the actors have entered sufficiently into the spirit of the occasion to make it interesting and funny. Some of the situations develop exceptionally good humorous conditions, while others are only less so. The film successfully accomplishes its purpose and raises the laughter of the audience. It could scarcely perform any better service.

"True to His Trust" (Kalem).—A historic frontier story which details the experiences of a baby with Blackfoot raiders. Like others of the Kalem films which have depicted exciting episodes that might have occurred in any frontier settlement, the picture will thrill with its tensity, yet it has practically nothing of the dime novel order about it. There is an earnestness of purpose in the leading characters which makes them seem real personages and holds the interest of the audience throughout the film. The melodramatic plays some part in the development of the plot, but it is not so marked as in some of the frontier pictures and the introduction of the baby adds immensely to its interest. The play introduces a new type of Indian and the audience is treated to an exhibition of Blackfeet. These Indian characters are quite the best features of this series of Kalem films, though this by no means belittles the importance of the story upon which the exhibition is strung.

The reproduction of disappearing Indian life is an important historic work which deserves encouragement.

"Running Fire" (Kalem).—A short, snappy comedy which will set them laughing. Less than 200 feet long this film has more fun packed into it than many so-called comedies five times as long. What is the use of explaining it? Better see for yourself. Or, if you ordered without seeing it, you would not be badly cheated if you didn't like it. Your audience will.

"The Sorrows of the Unfaithful" (Biograph).—It is not often that this company presents a picture of the character of this one. Insanity, murder, self-destruction are not pleasant features to contemplate even though they are presented with extraordinary dramatic power. Unfaithfulness is presented in what is probably its true light, and while its consequences are not always so tragic, they are serious enough in all cases to make them abhorrent. One death, perhaps two, in this picture was due to haste. While the picture teaches the disaster that follows unfaithfulness, it also teaches the dangers of haste. Explanations are often possible in cases of this sort and had one man investigated before he acted there might have been two deaths less. On the other hand, while the film clearly lays the blame on the girl, there are those who will say that she had a right to change, that no wedding ceremony had been performed and that she had a right to renounce her vows if she chose. The picture raises a nice question in ethics which can scarcely be satisfactorily answered without careful consideration, and then opinions will differ. The views in the picturesque old fishing village and the sea are well worth seeing.

"Cowboy Chivarly" (Lubin).—A cowboy's bravery in Indian fighting is used as a contrast for the athletic prowess of a tenderfoot with good effect. The dramatic situations are built up around a girl. Possibly Percy, the tenderfoot, would have got the girl if the Indians hadn't appeared. But, unfortunately, Percy's experience with Indians was limited and it is scarcely to be wondered at that he showed what is commonly called the white feather. Now enter the cowboy who knows all about Indians; and the chances he has to show how brave he is places him in high esteem with the girl again. Percy redeems himself, still he fails to get the girl. The story abounds in thrills and interesting situations and is acted with the usual snap of the Lubin players while the photography assist in making the film attractive.

"A Miscalculation" (Pathe).—A possible result of a miscalculation in astronomical observations. Following the erudite professor's lead his friends disposed of their belongings and made merry while awaiting the destruction of the earth by the comet. But the catastrophe did not occur and because his information came on crossed wires and was badly mixed he gets a vigorous drubbing.

"Butter Making in Normandy" (Pathe).—An industrial picture presenting in a graphic way how butter is made and prepared for the consumer in Normandy. Those familiar with butter making in this country, either in dairies or at the individual creamery, will be interested to note the somewhat different methods of manipulation. Those who are not familiar with the process anywhere will be interested because it shows the process of preparation of an important article of food. The photography is clear and some of the dairy maids are good to look upon.

"Dora Thorne" (Selig).—Bertha M. Clay's love story on the screen. Undoubtedly this film will be popular. Many thousands, perhaps, who have read the story will want to see the picture. Others may be interested to know how an earl's son, despite strenuous opposition, finally succeeds in marrying the gardener's daughter. For those who have thrilled and wept over the unfortunate love affairs of this couple here is an adequate reproduction that will make the story seem more vital. The actors enter into it with sympathy and they perform their parts with discretion. As a means of entertainment this picture will serve its purpose; but unlike some work done by Selig this has nothing permanent about it, and the end leaves no impression beyond the questionable emotion engendered by a love story of this type.

"Refusing a Mansion" (Gaumont).—How and why the mansion is refused is entertainingly told in the picture. Acted with the energy which characterizes the Gaumont Company and admirably photographed, the picture supplies sufficient entertainment to justify its existence. The question of why is answered and the audience is somewhat disposed to agree with the situation.

"Buying a Mother-in-Law" (Gaumont).—A novel way, perhaps, to obtain a mother-in-law, though maybe more have obtained them this way than is generally known. Anyhow, here is a clear presentation of such a case. Whether the price was too much, or not, is a question which might well be decided to suit each individual. Some would probably say one thing and some would say another, but the fact remains that many will say that to buy one at any price is a needless expenditure of money, or anything else that has value.

"The Shepherd's Dog" (Pathe).—An interesting picture in which a dog plays an important and altogether excellent part. Usually in a film of this type the interest centers in what the animal does, and this is no exception to the rule. Animal intelligence is always interesting, whether exhibited in the films or elsewhere, and such a picture is certain to be popular. Everyone is interested as soon as the picture appears and this interest never wanes until it ends.

"A School in New Guinea" (Pathe).—That they have schools in New Guinea may be a revelation. That they can be brought to the doors of those whose conception of the country is practically a blank, excepting that it is a region of savagery, is more interesting. The presence of schools argues improvement and that is an important feature. Meantime interesting bits of life and scenery are shown and one acquires a reasonably accurate idea of what life is among the natives of that far and little known land. The motion picture has here performed its most important function. It has conveyed useful information in an entertaining manner.

"Under the Old Apple Tree" (Vitagraph).—A comedy which seems to prove that many unexpected things can happen under the old apple tree. Whether or not all these did happen under such a tree is beside the question. The energy of the Vitagraph actors has developed a picture which has entertaining and novel situations and have worked it out to the logical conclusions with much sympathy. Meanwhile it is a comedy which keeps the audience laughing a considerable portion of the time. It is, therefore, of use and deserves the long run it will probably get.

"Love and the Law" (Edison).—A scene from "David Copperfield," by Charles Dickens. It is the well remembered incident of the hypothecated bonds which Uriah Heep expected to use to force Agnes to marry him. The story is closely followed and the actors have interpreted their parts with intelligence and discretion. It seems needless to go over the story, David Copperfield is known to every reader of English literature and probably a majority of those who see this film have rejoiced over the discomfiture of Uriah Heep and the happiness of David and Agnes. The staging and costuming of the play seem to represent the Dickens' story with as much accuracy as can reasonably be expected now. It is a difficult matter to stage a scene of this character so it will meet the objections of all captious critics. But perhaps if the work is done as well as this it will be sufficient to satisfy most who will see it. Moreover, it will make the characters in this story who have been loved or detested, as the case may be, living entities, endowed with intelligence and the power of voluntary action. In this instance the work has not only been done with care, but it has been accompanied by an appreciation of the really important features which are not always noticeable in an elaborate picture of this character.

"Neighbors, or Yvonne's Sacrifice" (Gaumont).—The title gives no hint of what the picture really is, a love story in which mother and daughter are rivals and the mother wins. Neither the acting or the story are particularly strong. The girl's grief is the best bit of acting in the piece, and that possesses no particular merit to raise it above the commonplace. The picture is scarcely worthy of the house that stands sponsor for it.

"Four Little Tailors" (Gaumont).—A humorous skit depicting the effort of four tailors to win the hand of the master's daughter when he promises to give her to the one most proficient in his business. The love story gives a touch of life to some good trick photography. One sews without a thread, the second sews without a needle and the third sews the wing of a fly. The fourth merely does well what a tailor should do and gets the girl, putting the seal of approval upon the man who does his work well.

"The Three Cherry Pits" (Vitagraph).—A duelling story with the death left out. The interest in this picture is greatly increased by the excellent character studies of the dignified old gentleman and his unique way of returning three cherry pits thrown at him by three thoughtless youths. He teaches two of them a salutary lesson and forgives the third because, as he puts it, his honor does not demand that he take life. There is all the tense interest connected with the duel, with the gruesome death scenes left out, a feature upon which the producing company deserves commendation. The imagination can supply anything required without the necessity of laying one or more victims dead at the feet of the audience. The closing scene, where the veteran falls back dead with the words of forgiveness upon his lips is strong, and as the party of men turn reverently away, one is sensibly impressed by the dignity of actual worth as distinguished from the ephemeral popularity of the moment

"Take Me Out to the Ball Game" (Essanay).—A lively travesty on the passion for baseball which actuates so many devotees of the sport now. Not always, however, will a man become so excited that he forgets to take his wife home, leaving her on the bleachers to find her way home as best she can. Probably the innovation of having bull pups chase umpires all over the grounds will not become popular, particularly with the luckless umpires, but in this instance it adds another feature of fun to a film already overflowing with it. Then comes the finale, which starts with a family row, but ends in peace and happiness at home. Blinks is undoubtedly benefited by his outing, though it must be confessed that his nervous condition borders on collapse at a number of stages of the progress of the story.

"The Romany Wife" (Kalem).—This firm has produced some satisfactory gypsy pictures before, but none, perhaps, comparable to this. The melodramatic features which frequently mar gypsy pictures are omitted and up to the time the young woman leaves the band actual gypsies posed for the film. The scenes are realistic and interesting. They are not imaginary, but are reproductions of what occurred in a gypsy camp. The romance, which supplies the heart interest, is woven around the girl's wedding with a farmer, her longing for her old life, and her final return to her husband. The story is well balanced and the actors have performed their parts with sympathy and appreciation of the dramatic possibilities of the situations. The photography is equally commendable, and the mechanical work on the film has been well done.

"The Troubles of a Policeman" (Pathe).—A funny story of Clancy, whose experience with a boy gang, the members of which persisted in shooting craps on his beat, constitute a warning to all men who are seeking appointment. And what happens to Clancy, as he faithfully attempts to perform his duty, is a series of adventures which combine the most devilish torments the genus gamin can devise. And it ends in a climax of exasperation when Clancy dives into the Hudson to rescue a boy from drowning, only to discover that the boy can swim better than he and gets out first.

"Scenes in Norway" (Pathe).—Carefully selected and well photographed scenes in Norway, affording some good views of the country and interpreting the life of that interesting locality so accurately that a good idea is given of how they live there. The scenes presented include a variety of pictures, country, city and personal. The operator selected his viewpoints with care and the resulting pictures are satisfactory representations of the land and the people.

"Shipbuilding in Toulson, France" (Urban).—An industrial subject, representing the importing shipbuilding yards of this town in France. All the operations about the construction of vessels is carefully presented, and one may look at this picture and see a vessel grow before one's eyes. The activities presented are interesting, showing how the work of construction is carried on, and what is required in performing it. As an adequate representation of an important industry this film is a success.

INDEPENDENT.

"The Count of Noaccount" (Atlas).—A lively comedy depicting the attempt of a barber to palm himself off as a count and his success until a late arrival exposes his masquerading. Then what the girls did to him would take pages to relate, but the most original thing was to treat him to a coat of jam and feathers, the jam serving in the absence of tar. Maybe this example could be followed with profit by other girls who are deceived by counts, bogus and otherwise.

"Why Dad Was Held Up" (Nestor).—A lively film presenting the methods adopted by a young man whose father objected to his choice. There was a fake holdup that looked to the uninitiated like the real thing, and when the girl who rescued him turned out to be the son's fiancee the father could not sufficiently express his admiration. The result was his consent to the marriage and a substantial check as a sort of basis for future fortunes.

"Shanghaied" (Defender).—It is a brutal custom to force men on board ships against their will and compel them to work before the mast on long voyages. It was common in the past. It has not been altogether stopped yet. This picture represents how it was done in some instances and shows clearly the brutality and utter heartlessness of it all. Dramatic because it presents a subject that represents suffering, the film is rather a record than a drama. Of it, possibly, the old observation is true that real life is the most dramatic of all. The Defender people have done well in bringing a matter of this sort so graphically and convincingly before many thousand people who otherwise would scarcely understand its meaning.

"Carmen" (Film d'Art).—A sumptuous reproduction of this fascinating and dramatic piece. The leading actress portrays the cold and cruel heartlessness of the beautiful cigar maker with appreciation and discretion. The Don Jose is well done, too. Staging and costuming are quite in harmony with the popular conception of the opera. Indeed, the producer has evidently employed the best talent procurable and has brought out a film which is notable, if, indeed, a film portraying a theme of this kind can be notable. Not once, but many times, the enchantress has appeared on the screen. Each rendition has possessed certain attractive features not produced by others. This picture is singularly well balanced dramatically and its mechanical perfection can scarcely be questioned. It is well worth seeing, even if one has seen all previous Carmens. Well done the opera never tires, and good reproductions on the films will never weary. The story contains so much of the weaknesses of humanity that it will be always popular.

"The Senator's Double" (Imp).—To have one man take the place of another and deliver an important speech is a novel sensation upon which to base a picture. That it was successfully carried out adds to the interest. But to add a love story seems to be offering more than one's money's worth. Mourning and pain have vanished. The senate chamber and its ambitions disappear, and the hearts are filled with love and tenderness as only Cupid can make possible.

"Only a Bunch of Flowers" (Lux).—Yes, this picture is undoubtedly a transcript of life. Perhaps it is too nearly accurate. One becomes uncomfortable under its influence since it suggests possibilities which almost everyone would prefer to thrust far away. Disaster, death, grief. Often enough they follow in a never ceasing train. A faithful reproduction arouses unpleasant emotions and one wishes it were possible to think that such things do not occur. Yet they do and here is a reproduction that might well be taken from life.

"That Typist Again" (Lux).—Whether this is intended as an attack on typists or is a travesty upon the way some women act does not appear. However, when his wife suddenly descends upon his establishment bent on mischief one of his male clerks dons woman's clothes and saves the day.

"The Redman's Persecution" (Bison).—An illustration of how the Indians' land has been taken from them by United States soldiers ordering them to move further onward when the land was wanted by white men. The arrest, imprisonment and escape of the chief are well managed. The war dance at the camp is a revelation to many who have never seen anything of the sort (though it seems a bit weak in places) and the final order to move are important features of the picture. The principal point of interest is the implied persecution of the Indians in ordering them away unjustly. It is a tale which will bear constant repeating. The people of this country cannot know it any too well.

"She Stoops to Conquer" (Thanhouser).—Goldsmith's well known comedy put upon the films. Opinions may differ as to whether it is an artistic triumph or not, but the fact remains that the actors have interpreted the parts with reasonable accuracy. It is so seldom that this comedy is seen in these times that comparatively few are familiar with it. However, it is well known that Goldsmith's work was once popular and occasionally a company is found that stages it now. Perhaps the mere fact that it is here adequately shown will be of benefit since it will encourage a reperusal of the play. The characters of Hardcastle, Kate and Marlow are admirably done and seem to correctly interpret the original. The staging and costuming are in harmony with the play and reproduce the scenery of the time depicted with accuracy. The usefulness of a work of this sort does not end with the presentation of the play itself. There is an educational value in it which includes the costuming and the reproduction of the surroundings of the time. These are so unfamiliar now that they afford not a little addition to the interest and pleasure of such a film. The work has been done so well that the company deserves commendation for undertaking the task. It is not an easy matter to reproduce a play of this character and when it is well done the company performing it deserves praise.

"The Firemen of Cairo" (Eclair).—A film that not only conveys information concerning an Egyptian fire department, but shows a fire in progress and a daring rescue. How people do things elsewhere in the world is always interesting, and it is impossible to escape the fascination of these thrilling rescues. And when a picture of this sort is as satisfactorily produced as this one is, much pleasure is the result of seeing it. The photography is good, considering the difficulty of the subject, and a good impression is given of the methods of Egyptian fire fighters.

"The Taming of Jane" (Imp).—If men understood women, which they never will, this film would possess no interest. But here is depicted a wild girl, a tomboy, who delights in bothering her lover, even though he uses somewhat vigorous measures in his wooing. Finally it takes her father to help in the taming process. It is accomplished by making her believe that she has shot her lover. The wedding ceremony follows. The picture is a characteristic study of more than ordinary interest, aside from being a lively film with numerous interesting situations.

"The Gang Leader's Reform" (Yankee).—A story of the reform of an East Side gang leader through imprisonment that is chiefly interesting in its depiction of certain conditions that are apparently inseparable from crowded city life. The story itself is no more nor less than could be told of others, many of whom, perhaps, have plied their calling unmolested. What becomes of the bully is scarcely of interest, excepting as it represents unfortunate social conditions and their consequences. The suggestions contained in the picture are numerous, not the least of which is the one that the police might stop all the plug ugly business if they chose. To those unfamiliar with New York the film will bring a new view of certain features of life there. Those who know the city will see it in a reproduction of incidents illustrative of its worst phases.

"A Woman's Power" (Powers).—A love story woven around a fake stock deal which purports to show that a man cannot, provided he is in love with a girl, entrap her father into parting with his cash for stock which is worthless. Of course the comedy climax adds a peculiar flavor to the story when the boy brings in the note that confidently asserts that no woman is worth $2,000. That is a point upon which considerable disagreement would exist. The hero of this tale is quite content to follow the straight and narrow road, more especially when it leads him into the arms of his beloved. Some of the scenery is picturesque, particularly the river views where a portion of the love making occurs.

"The Mascot of Company D" (Bison).—A frontier picture depicting United States army life so realistically that some of the scenes make one shudder. There are camp scenes, marching scenes, Indian scenes, the public degradation of a soldier who has broken some military law, the stealing of a child by the Indians and his thrilling rescue and the extermination of a band of Indians by the soldiers so realistic that one seems to be looking upon the actual combat. If action is wanted, plenty of it is crowded into this film. No lover of wild Western tales, with their multiplied horrors could find any fault with this combination of sizzling incidents.

"The Gunsmith" (Powers).—A dramatic film which illustrates the power of a child. It is hard to have one's savings stolen; it is harder to have one's sweetheart die of a broken heart, and there is something inexpressibly sweet in being at last able to revenge one's self for all these wrongs. But here enters the child, and before the murderous object is accomplished the little one's mute pleadings are sufficient to stem the tide of long pent passion and the avenger drops his pistol and silently leaves the room. That last scene is a strong one. There is something about it that goes straight to the heart and involuntarily a suspicious moisture gathers about the eyelids. If sympathy had been with one man, it changes, and is equally strong for the other, and there is a sigh of relief when the man with the pistol leaves the house.

"The Deceivers" (Powers).—A lively comedy representing the possibilities that reside in artificial makeups calculated to deceive. Both the woman and the man in this picture resorted to artificial means to increase their good looks, and while there was some consternation when the deceit was discovered they finally sensibly decide that neither has anything on the other and conclude to proceed with the arrangements for the wedding.

"A Dainty Politician" (Thanhouser).—Apparently someone connected with this house has learned something of ward politics, and the methods of controlling a convention are very clearly and bluntly stated. It isn't always possible to expose such plots as this one was exposed, but it would be a good thing if it could be done. Maybe this film will have its influence in showing people what is sometimes done and have a beneficial effect. The situations are dramatically worked out and the interest never flags from the beginning to the end. The love story adds a certain degree of interest to the picture and the development of the plot is strengthened by the young people's love making.

"A Fatal Vengeance" (Ambrosio).—The eternal triangle again, two women and one man, a picture which serves to emphasize the folly of wrongdoing and should impress upon those who see it the oft repeated admonition that the consequences of folly almost invariably return to inflict themselves upon those responsible for the wrong act. A woman deliberately plots vengeance, and when her actions lead to a duel she dramatically rushes between the combatants and receives one of the bullets in her own body. These stories seem old, yet it is almost impossible to escape from the same old plots. Human life contains much of sameness in its manifestations and difficulty is experienced in developing new plots. The difference exists in the way they are worked out. This one may teach an important lesson dramatically, but the way it is worked out is not altogether pleasing.

"Fricot's Itching Powder" (Ambrosio).—A rough-house comedy, purporting to represent the antics of a man dosed with itching powder. The belaboring administered by his wife and her mother soothe the maddening discomfort and he submits to it without a murmur, well pleased that he could escape so readily.

"The Tale of the Hot Dog" (Atlas).—A humorous exposition of the ubiquitous hot dog and what happened to a man who worked a job lot of wursts upon unthinking and unsuspecting itinerant dealers. They all made the discovery at about the same time that they had been swindled. Then began one of those long and lively chases, ending in a punishment to fit the crime. The unfortunate and altogether too greedy vendor was forced to eat all but one of his ancient canines. The remaining one was what killed the cat. What more horrible punishment could be devised?

"A Bully's Waterloo" (Atlas).—Almost everyone will see this picture with much grim satisfaction. Everyone has seen the bully. He is always present, and always displaying his troublesome personality to the best advantage to himself. Here is a typical specimen, making trouble for and abusing everyone smaller and weaker than himself. One day one of those ladylike young men who sell ribbons, etc., wandered into town. There was an encounter. The little man ripped his glove, burst a button off his shirt, and disarranged his hair. The bully? Oh, he vacated, and so far as visible evidences go he is still running. Somebody should have informed the little man who the bully was so he wouldn't have ruined that glove. This story has real human interest in it and induces a sense of exultation that the bully is at last cowed.

"In the Black Hills" (Nestor).—The triangle gets a bad wrench in this film and its three sides are extended to four. An innocent wife and an innocent man suspected and accused of a wrong they never committed and the attempted suicide of the wife prevented through a wild race between an automobile and the train under which the wife would be ground to pieces. But it was accomplished, and a hysterically happy quartet proceeded home more slowly than they came. Melodramatic in the extreme, the film has the merit of lively action and ability to hold the unflagging interest of the audience. The race is thrilling and keeps the interest keyed up to a high pitch. And one's sympathies go out to the unfortunate wife who was made the unwilling victim of incriminating circumstances.

"The Sewing Girl" (Powers).—A dog carries away a wallet and a poor sewing girl is accused of the theft. But the wallet is found and the owner arrives in time to prevent the unfortunate girl's arrest. It is not a great picture. Indeed, it falls far short of the standard set by Powers heretofore. The characters perform the parts they have well enough, but the parts themselves are not strong and amount to very little. The mechanical work is, perhaps, good enough, but aside from that there is little to attract attention.

"The Girl Reporter" (Thanhauser).—A love story with the scenes laid in a newspaper office, and requiring some clever detective work on the part of the girl. Anyhow she succeeds in clearing her sweetheart of false accusations and places the blame where it belongs, on the shoulders of his former employer.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

Questions and Answers.—Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Salt Lake City Operators (Some of Them) Defended.—Salt Lake City (Bob Worthen) writes as follows: "Friend Richardson—Just a few words in regard to a 'Red Hot One on Salt Lake' that appeared in your column some time ago. I have been a reader of your paper and column for the last two years and await its arrival each week. While I will admit that there are a few crank butchers here who learned their business turning a grindstone and were taken by some of the cheap managers from the ranks of the 'Knights of the Broom and Dustpan' and placed in an operating room at $12 per-haps, still there are also some first-class men who know the business from A to Z. If there are any better projected pictures anywhere than those shown at the Luna, the Casino and the La Vista theaters, I will have to be shown. The operators at the above houses are all married men who have been in the business for a number of years and have held down their present jobs for two years that I know of. They did all their own wiring and installing of machines, so they must be capable men, otherwise they would not be able to do such things. They do not have to take their machines to a repair shop to have a pin put in or a take-up belt tightened, like some would-be operators around this town. The kind friend who judged all Salt Lake City operators by the two he mentioned had better drop around to a show where they employ a good operator at $25 per week, not $8 and $12. Also, Friend Richardson, if you ever visit Salt Lake City again, you will see a different town than you did in 1889. There are no 'white poles down the center of our wide, shady streets,' and all the streets are nicely paved. With best wishes for the World and the Operators' Column, I remain,

"BOB NORTHEN."

Glad to hear from you, Salt Lake, and to know that things are not so bad as was set forth in the letter referred to. I've no doubt but that the houses you name, Friend Worthen, are putting up a good performance, as you say. It is a pity all the houses don't follow suit. Maybe you have done away with the poles and paved the streets, but I'll bet you haven't cut down your ten-acre city blocks! Let us hear from you again.

Small Bootn.—Claremore, Okla., writes: "Being a constant reader of the World, I find various complaints of Eastern operators, or supposed to be, regarding small booths, lack of supplies and wages. I think this is generally the fault of the operator himself. I have a 5x5x7 steel booth, one door and three small openings. The very smallness of this booth makes everything convenient to the hand. In case of accident during performance I lose no time in running around booth looking for tools. No need of room for visitors. Have always had a sufficiency of supplies and have never been asked if I had eaten the carbons. I can account for this in that I have always tried to give the manager what he wanted, a good, clear, steady picture, thereby pleasing the public. As to wages, I have always been able to get what was right, and every other operator can do the same, and have no knock coming."

Claremore probably means all right and writes according to his experience. But it is a moral certainty that his experience is limited to shows in small towns, where the show, except possibly one or two days a week, runs only in the evening. Your 5x5x7 booth would not suit me at all, Claremore. Imagine being cooped up in that sort of a box from 11 A. M. to 5 P. M., or from 5 P. M. to 11.30 P. M.! Because the room is large it by no means follows that the operator will have to hunt around for tools If he is the right sort his tools will all be arranged in convenient racks where he can lay his hand on anything wanted with his eyes shut. The "no visitors" and "excellence of projection" portions of your letter I can most heartily commend. In fact, I cannot commend either of those two propositions, particularly the latter, too strongly. It would be most interesting to know what Claremore is satisfied with in the matter of salary. Possibly his ideas might not be the ideas of other men.

Peculiar Things.—Canton, Mo., writes: "The Column is the very first thing I read when the World comes. When you roast some operators I take it as a helping hand. I dont get sore like James Garvin, of Jersey City, and a few others. Keep it up! I don't think that your slats are in any great danger, do you? I have considerable trouble with fuses blowing. This house is not a large one and they have plain fuse wire (40 amp.) instead of cartridge fuses. Fuse block is about three feet above the meter, which is only 20 amp. I have to use 45 to 50 amperes at the arc in order to get a good picture and after running about an hour and a half the fuses start to blow. I am afraid to use heavier ampere fuse wire for fear of burning out the meter. What would you advise? I also have considerable trouble with my back condenser breaking. I eliminate all drafts as much as possible, and do not get them too tight in the mount, but they break in spite of ——. Light controlling device is a Fort Wayne Compensarc, 20-40-60, 60-cycle; throw is about sixty feet."

Friend Canton, I cannot quite reconcile your statements. You say you pull from 45 to 50 amperes at the arc and then inform me that your Compensarc has 20, 40 and 60 ampere contacts. Does this mean that you are running on the 60 contact and using resistance wire in series with the arc? That would be the only way to get "40 to 50" from that particular Compensarc. Again, you say you have in 40-ampere fuses and they start to blow after a time, though the meter is but 20 amperes. Gee! I should think you would be afraid to fuse any higher. Even though you count the amperage after passing the transformer (Compensarc), the meter is overloaded, and if your fuses are ahead of the Compensarc you have something more than a 100 per cent. overload on the meter. I cannot advise without more accurate information, Canton. It would seem, however, that in any event your meter is smaller than it should be. As to the condenser breakage: Unless local laws prohibit it, try leaving back of lamp house open, also plenty of ventilation at its top, even raising the top hood slightly, but avoid all drafts which will strike the lamp house directly. Have plenty of ventilation in the condenser casing also. If obliged to keep lamp house shut (there is no more danger of setting fire to anything through having the back of the lamp house open than there is of setting fire to the Mississippi River with a match), then be sure the ventilation at top of lamp house is open and free from accumulation of ash. If there is not much ventilation in lamp house, have very little in condensing casing. It is extremely difficult to tell what causes condensing lenses to break sometimes. Send more accurate information about the other matter and I will see what I can do for you.

Coupon Tickets.—Vicksburg, Miss., writes: "Where can I get roll tickets with a stay-over coupon attached to each ticket? I saw something of the kind in use when I was in Cleveland last Spring. It was a sort of double roll, a stay-over coupon being attached to each ticket, with perforation between. Aside from this they were the regular numbered roll ticket. Are they expensive?"

Yes, Vicksburg, there is such a roll ticket as you describe and you can get them of the Selig Polyscope Company, Chicago, Ill. They are comparatively expensive, being either twenty or forty cents per roll of 2,000, I have forgotten which. There are doubtless other companies and many exchanges handling them, but the Selig Company is the only one I personally know of.

Various Things.—Blaine Day, Sherman, Tex., writes: "If some of the operators would get down to a little hard studying and put their heads to work instead of poking them out of the operating room to flirt with peroxide blondes there would very soon be a marked improvement in projection as a whole. I like the girls as well as any one, but the operating room is not a 'garden of love,' but a place for work, and nothing but work. Take a day off when you want to flirt with the girls, blondes or otherwise! Study won't hurt anyone. You cannot learn it all in a day, a month, or a lifetime, for that matter, but you can soon learn to materially improve your work. In my opinion an operator should be at least 21 years of age and able to pass a thorough examination. If the film exchanges would wake up and take hold of the operator problem it would better conditions in a short while. Personally I would like to see exchanges furnish all the operators, the taking of service from an exchange obliging the exhibitor to hire the exchange operator also. Certainly the exchange would only have operators who would know their business, since otherwise the exchanges' own stock would suffer. I thoroughly agree with you that it was an outrage to run a sprocket such as is shown on poge 302, August 6 issue, but too many managers there are who insist on the machine continuing to grind until it is literally ready to fall apart from lack of repairs. Exchanges would serve their own interests if they would cut off service from managers who do not keep their machines in proper repair."

Neighbor Day continues, describing the house he works in at length. It seems an exceptionally well equipped plant. As to the exchanges furnishing operators it would, I believe, remedy one fault in that the operators could be made to take better care of films, but it would make for bad work in other directions. Then, too, it would be utterly unjust and impossible, making operators a race of homeless nomads, since the job would change every time the manager changed service, and that is quite often with some of them. The suggestion that the exchange require the machine to be kept in good condition is excellent. The only trouble with that is the fact that the exchanges won't do it.

Setting Intermittent.—Pennsylvania (town suppressed), asks how to tighten the intermittent movement of the Standard machine.

The star shaft of the Standard runs in eccentric bushings, just the same as does the Powers No. 5, of which you have one also, except that the Standard bushings are longer. Look in at the end of the star shaft and you will see what I mean. Turn these bushings slightly and the star will tighten or loosen in relation to the cam wheel, according to which way the bushing is turned.

Washington.—A letter from Washington, D. C., indicates very bad conditions in the Capitol City. There are fifty-seven picture shows there, says the correspondent, and out of them but eight or ten may be considered first-class. In the rest the projection is miserable, much of the operating being done by eight and twelve-dollar a week men. The Pickwick, Circle, Empress, Colonial, Plaza, Metropolitan, Mealows (?) and Navy (?) are given as the good houses. The ? marks question the names, which I could scarcely make out. Guess I got them right.

Sorry, Washington, to hear such bad reports from City Beautiful. But allow me to say that if you have even eight houses in fifty-seven in which projection is really first-class, in all that term implies, you have a much better showing than has the average city. Very much better. In all New York I have found not one single house wherein nothing is left to be desired and only one in which perfection is even approached—in projection I mean.

Overlooked.—In a letter from McAdoo, Pa., which evidently was mislaid, the question is asked: "Rosedale, Miss., complains that a certain make of film does not run well. I am troubled exactly the same way and would like to know if the make that bothers me is the same Rosedale has complained of. ——— is the one with me."

No, that is not the film Rosedale complained of.

Old Lamps.—Durango, Colorado, asks: "What makes some of my incandescent lights burn dim while others right beside them on the same wires are white and brilliant? What recourse have I when a booking agency sends me acts which are absolutely rotten? I am so far from Denver that getting acts is costly; moreover, it takes time, but I have had some people sent here who were simply awful and it hurts my business, of course. Seems to me there ought to be some remedy."

As to the lamps, the dimness of some of them is no doubt caused by the fact that they are old lamps which have reached the limit of their usefulness. The average life of the incandescent lamp is placed at 800 hours of actual use, but long before this limit is reached it begins to lose its brilliancy and burns red and dim. It then actually consumes more current than it did when new, but gives far less light. Old lamps are poor economy. When they begin to burn red throw them away and install new ones. It will pay you, particularly if you are operating on meter current. As to the vaudeville: Yes, it really does seem as though you ought to have some recourse in damages, but such is not the case. The only thing you can do is close the acts and do without until new ones arrive. BUT you can get more, and maybe better, film service and cut out the vaudeville entirely. That will bring Mr. Booking Agent to time, if anything will, and secure you better treatment when you resume taking acts—provided you ever should do so once you have given the Silent a fair show!

The School Idea.—By actual count I have sixty-nine letters from union operators (members of operators' unions), some from New York, Boston, Chicago and nearly every large city in the union, either strongly commending the Operator's School idea or commenting on it favorably. These men are taking the right view. The average operator can see but ONE thing in the school, viz.: it will make more operators, with consequent tendency to wage reduction. IT WILL DO NOTHING OF THE SORT, at least not for a long, long time to come. As has been pointed out time, time, time and again, there is not in this country to-day one operator to every ten jobs. Operators, union and otherwise, might as well wake up to the fact that one of two things is going to happen, viz.: either there has got to be a material improvement in projection, and a very material one, too, or the moving picture theater business will suffer a gradual decline. BETTER OPERATORS OR LESS THEATERS is the writing on the wall. The school is not and was not designed for the novice. It is and was brought into being with the idea that the crank-turner would be but too glad of the opportunity to perfect himself in his chosen calling. Let the operator himself, already possessed of a considerable fund of practical knowledge, take the school course, and when he is through he need have no fear of the school man, as such. There are too many of the men who occupy a dog-in-the-manger attitude. They have not the knowledge requisite to do good work themselves and strenuously object to anyone else learning. The writer has, aside from the letters spoken of, received quite a few threatening ones setting forth what the writers "would do" if he did not cease lecturing at the Taylor School; also he is informed that one union has made threats of dire consequences. For such vaporings he cares less than nothing—considerably less. He is engaged in an endeavor to elevate the business of operating and intends to keep right on until something is accomplished. If the old operators wake up and get busy, well and good; if not, then they will gradually find themselves superseded by men who are willing to learn and make themselves able to produce "the goods" on the screen.

Seat Space.—Fort Smith, Ark., writes: "Will you kindly tell me how far my seat-rows should be apart? I am remodeling and have had some argument as to the proper distance between rows of seats."

Thirty-two inches from chair back to chair back is most excellent. That is the Chicago legal requirement and it is as good a rule as could be followed. If your rows are too close together it will seriously inconvenience your audience and render them more or less uncomfortable, which means lost business. If, on the other hand, the rows are unnecessarily far apart, there is loss of valuable space. Thirty-two inches is just right, all things considered.

MOVING PICTURES IN RUSSIA.

A representative of The Moving Picture World submits the following items of general interest in regard to the moving picture industry in Rushia, that immense country of the Czar. While the exhibition of the moving picture there is only in its infancy, it has, however, made a very substantial and promising beginning. The theaters are mostly small but give a great deal of attention to the exhibition of the pictures, using sound effects and, in a few of the larger and better class houses, an orchestra to add to their effectiveness. In fact, greater care in this respect and better results are seen than in the majority of American moving picture theaters. The moving picture theater in Russia confines itself to pictures and vaudeville is never attempted. Neither do they know anything of the song slides, which are so popular with us. The pictures are only changed once a week and are all of foreign make, chiefly French. The price of admission is about one-third the charge of the regular theater and commences at about fifteen cents of the lowest price being charged for the front seats nearest the our money; each theater having a scale of three or four prices, screen. The patrons are chiefly of the middle and higher class. It would seem that many of our American subjects would please a Russian audience, and The Moving Picture World believes that there should be a good opening here for our film manufacturers. In Russia the moving picture would seem to have one of its greatest opportunities for the enlightenment and education of the population of this vast empire, and in this respect the moving picture is a universal language known and read by all men. What a stupendous educational lever the moving picture may become not only in Russia but in the Mohammedan countries which border it on the South and West. Pictures of American life and habits and of representative scenes in the life of peoples in other more highly civilized countries should have an incalculable and immediate effect on the thought, habits and lives of these less favored because less enlightened

THE "IMP" MOVES.

The Independent Moving Pictures Company, producers of "Imp" films, moved this week to their new quarters at 102 West 101st street, Manhattan. It did not take many months for this concern to outgrow premises that were at first thought too big. The large floor space and improved equipment should enable the "Imp" and his satellites to give us even better films than ever before.

Chicago Notes.

On September 5, 1910, the offices of The Moving Picture World will move to enlarged quarters at 160 Washington street (Post Building), Suite 307. Telephone Main 3145.

The Moving Picture World having recognized that Chicago is the Western center for motion picture interests, decided to enlarge its offices and open them as headquarters to all manufacturers, renters, exhibitors visiting Chicago, where they will find a general bureau of information, desks and stationery to write their letters, catalogues, trade papers, photos, views, samples, etc. Everything free to the friends of The Moving Picture World and a courteous welcome at hand.

We are pleased to observe that the Lubin films are rapidly gaining in popularity throughout the West, and many exhibitors who heretofore would not show a Lubin are now asking for them. At the Orpheum Theater Lubin's "Shorty at the Shore" was well received and proved to be a regular scream.

Mr. Clark, of Rockford, Ill., paid a visit to the Windy City this week, and expressed himself as being well satisfied with the business done during the Summer months. Although his theater has a very simple "store front," Mr. Clark claims to have the best patronage of any exhibitor in his city, and he attributes his success to the quality of his pictures and the manner in which he exhibits them. According to his statement, the Mirror Screen with which he has equipped his theater, is worth more to him than the most elaborate lobby.

Among other Chicago visitors were Mr. Bommerschein, proprietor of the Lyric, at Streator; W. E. Soles, Vaudette Theater, Woodstock, and Mr. Sullivan, of Elgin, Ill.

Mr. Pyle, the very popular manager of the Standard Film Exchange, has resigned his position with that company and is now enjoying a well-earned vacation. Upon his return he intends to re-enter the film business, but is as yet undecided as to which particular branch he will take up.

The Essanay Manufacturing Company's genial manager, Mr. Kennedy, has resigned his position with that firm.

The decision of the judge on the fight pictures is still pending. Aaron Jones and Geo. K. Spoor, owners of the Illinois rights, exhibited the pictures at the Hughes Theater, on Madison street, just outside the city limits, and notwithstanding the distance, the films were shown to capacity houses, as the incessant talk of the newspapers has freely advertised the fight pictures, and perhaps more effectively

The Filmlogue Company of America, 315 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill., is putting on the market a new patented frame which should be considered by any exhibitor having at heart the good of his business. The frame is a folding device, with hinges and locks, made of solid brass and protected by a heavy French plate glass. The interior of the frame is made into a sort of cushion on which composition letters, of different sizes, colors and styles are placed in rotation to form the words needed for the program or announcement. By closing the frame, the heavy glass presses the letters on the cushion and holds them firmly in place, from which they cannot be jarred. It is the most practical and the neatest sign offered, and anyone knowing his A B C can make the daily program in a few minutes. The same frame can be used for posters, photos or any other such advertising matters. The frame can be made to hang on the walls of the lobby or placed on easels and as it is ornamental it is sure to enhance the beauty of any modern lobby. The programing of the show is good policy, as it stimulates the interest of its patrons.

Miss M. A. Perrin, the talented instructress of the Filmlogue Company of America, left Sunday evening for California, her home State, on business for the above named company. We wish her a very pleasant trip and a safe return.

AMONG THE SHOWS.

Along Lincoln avenue up as far north as Addison street there are six theaters, two of which are independent houses, the others featuring license realeases. The first in line is that owned by Mr. Geo. I. Wiley and known as Wiley's Theater. The seating capacity here is some 280 and all seats are so arranged as to give an excellent view of the screen from any position in the house. Mr. Wiley's program on the Sabbath is composed of historical and other educational pictures. On week days Mr. Wiley runs the regular releases of the licensed manufacturers.

About a block or two farther north lies Hydns' Theater. Mr. Hynds is the manager of this little house, which has a seating capacity of about 200, running licensed pictures. The Hynds' Theater, as the others, are not imposing structures, but they serve the purpose, giving a good exhibition of pictures and are all well equipped with fans and other means of artificial hot weather comforts.

The American Theater pays more attention to vaudeville than to pictures, but the two independent reels are well projected and much care is exercised in the presentation. Mr. Yost is the manager of this house and has a fine family patronage to draw from. His house is always packed to the last of the 600 seats and everything is provided for the comfort of his patrons. This is the only house along Lincoln avenue that has a pretentious front and lobby.

The Royal Theater, located at Belmont and Lincoln avenues, is a large picture house for this neighborhood. The seating capacity here is 940. A unique advertising novelty used by this house is a border of the trade-marks of the licensed manufacturers running around the outside of the building in addition to the many posters displayed in the lobby and on racks outside. J. L. Lederer, the manager of the Royal, has certainly built up a wonderful patronage and deserves much credit for his many novel schemes for publicity.

CORRECTION.

It is a rather hard task to keep in touch with the doings of all the moving picture theaters of a big city like Chicago, as changes are taking place daily.

When I prepared the notes on the Swanson Theater, the house was then in the hands of a receiver and everything was conducted on the cheapest scale, a rather poor policy, as, if the house had been properly managed the results would have been more satisfactory to the owners and creditors.

I am pleased to state that the receivership has been dissolved and that Mr. Mitchell, the manager, is now putting the house on its feet and intends to regain for it the old well-known reputation.

No more old licensed junk is shown, but only the cream from the independent manufacturers. Frames and easels for the posters have been purchased and Mr. Mitchell hopes to have installed by the end of the week his new $400 electric signs, and early in September the painters and decorators will get busy renovating the whole front and lobby.

Our best wishes are with Mr. Mitchell and we will be pleased to visit the place when the alterations are completed.

SOUVENIRS.

On a five-cent admission you cannot give much of a souvenir, and people are becoming more or less tired of cheap little novelties. When the admission is five cents a good plan would be to give a coupon, and upon presentation of a certain number the person receives a premium. For instance, say that with each five-cent admission you give a coupon valued at two cents, when the person has accumulated 50 of them he or she would be entitled to a premium valued at $1, but which would only cost you about 50 cents. This plan would cost you one cent on each admission, while the customer would be receiving a two-cent value. Takita, Ogawa & Co., 166 Lake street, Chicago, have a fine collection of Japanese tea sets, rich vases, etc., real ornaments for the home, that can be bought very reasonably and exchanged for coupons in the above manner. An exhibitor can buy from this firm a set of 12 Japanese cups and saucers for $1, which could be given as a prize to the holder of 100 coupons. When a lady has saved about 50 coupons, she will be very anxious to get the remaining 50, and by asking her neighbors and friends to save them for her she will unconsciously be advertising your theater very effectively.

THE PIPE ORGAN.

We have always advocated and encouraged good music for motion pictures, as we believed and since have been gratified with the proofs from all over the country, that appropriate music enhances the value of the pictures. A poor actor, who cannot recite his part with the proper expressions, kills a play. It is the same with motion pictures, as they are silent, bad music kills the sentiments, while good sound effects bring out the impressions.

While encouraging appropriate music, we have already condemned the use of the pipe organ.

A pipe organ is a very good instrument and can be used with a certain advantage in a few pictures, but as we have not enough of these religious films, it seems to us that the excessive cost of a pipe organ could be used to a better advantage. The Orpheum Theater of Chicago, considered the first house in the country for good music, has an organ, but it is a simple parlor organ placed next to the piano and used only for scenes calling for religious music. The Orpheum is devoting the monetary difference between a pipe organ and a parlor organ to the purchase of a larger assortment of traps for sound effects, and have now the most complete orchestra for a moving picture theater.

The pipe organ is sold to certain exhibitors as an advertisement or a drawing card, but we are not sure if the investment is a very profitable one, as, while many persons enjoy the soft notes pealed by a pipe organ, they also object to hear religious music played to accompany wild Western scenes, fights, murders, etc.

I do not wish to discredit the value of the pipe organ, but on Monday night when I left the Orpheum to visit the Alcazar, I failed to see where the pipe organ was drawing any extra patronage. The Alcazar with its pipe organ, its five-cent admission, had less patrons than the Orpheum with its ten-cent admission.

On Monday evening, August 22, I visited the Alcazar on Madison street, Chicago, and they played the pipe organ during the exhibition of the Selig film "Dora Thorne." It was very painful to hear the sweet notes of the pipe organ during the scene of jealousy, or when a lover fired a bullet at his rival, or while the two rivals were fighting, or again when the girl tried to commit suicide.

The pipe organ manufacturers have done their best for years to give to their instrument the tones of the celestial voices; it then seems out of place to use the church musical instrument, the instrument calling for peace on earth and good will, to accompany scenes depicting some of our social evils.

The pipe organ is a very fine instrument and can be made an attraction, but in this case it should be used for only certain scenes or to give music during the intermission.

The cocoanut shells when well worked give a very good effect of the trotting of horses, but a picture would be ruined if the drummer was to work his cocoanut shells from beginning to end. It is the same with the pipe organ; while it is delicious to hear in a religious scene, it is tiresome and out of place when played the whole length of the film.

A plain parlor organ will do your work just the same and use the extra money to complete your stock of traps so as to have sound effects for every scene of the picture. Lyman Howe made a fortune and is still the most popular exhibitor of motion pictures because he made it a study to give the best appropriate music and sound effects with the pictures. If Lyman Howe had abused the use of a pipe organ, he would be out of business by this time. J. M. B.

The Roby Theatre, an unpretentious little house on the west side of Chicago, has one notable feature that is well worth due mention. Over the front lobby is a beautiful art glass dome, which when illuminated at night presents a most unique and attractive sight.

A LIBEL ON THE BUSINESS.

The young man, who in the "Georgian," published at Atlanta, Ga., takes the moving pictures under his juvenile wing, should be removed from his desk forthwith, if our contemporary wishes to retain whatever reputation it may possess for common sense and editorial poise. In the issue of the "Georgian" for Thursday, July 7, the writer in question, who rejoices in the name of Percy H. Whiting, chuckles over the prohibition of the Jeffries-Johnson pictures in Atlanta, and then goes on to say: "The pictures that are sometimes shown in Atlanta are calculated to bring a blush to the most hardened cheek, to offer suggestions that demoralize young men, to tend to lead young women astray, and to make the work of the white slaver easy." There is more to the same effect which we will not insult our readers by quoting. It hardly needs the assurance of an exhibiting friend of The Moving Picture World at Atlanta to convince us that the quotation we give is an abominable libel on the business. Such pictures as the man Whiting refers to are not made by any reputable manufacturer, and are not shown by any exhibitor who has the best interests of the business at heart. Our exhibiting correspondent says: "The shows here in Atlanta are very high class, and we receive all the first run films and the very best of everything." We hope the "Georgian" will take notice of our rebuke and not allow its columns to be again used by these vicious libels on the moving pictures.

A POPULAR CHICAGO THEATER.

Chicago, Ill., August 12, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir.—One of the most enjoyable moving picture entertainments I ever had the pleasure of attending was last evening at the Orchard Theater, a very handsome house, on North avenue. In fact, I might say here that my friends and self find the Orchard the most satisfactory place in the city, not excepting the larger loop district houses, at which to see recent releases of the best manufacturers.

The house is clean, well ventilated and comfortable—in perfect order. While the capacity of 500 is always taxed to the utmost, the audiences, though of almost every nationality, are most well behaved and thoroughly enjoy the entertainments.

Last evening we had the usual three reels of film, one educational subject by Pathe Freres, one drama by the Vitagraph, and the Biograph release.

While standing outside the theater, in the rapidly increasing crowd awaiting an opportunity to enter, we heard unusual prolonged applause and cheers. As this took place during the running of the last reel, I determined to watch for the cause of such spontaneous approbation.

Need I say it was found in the Biograph's "A Salutary Lesson," occasioned by the scene where the life saver dashes through the surf to the rescue of the little girl, who, having strayed across the bay when the tide was out, awakens from a nap to find herself cut off from shore by the rapidly rising waters? Not since the Biograph's "Leather Stocking" have I seen an audience so wrought up by a moving picture.

The Orchard offers no vaudeville, but one must concede that the popularity of the place, evidenced every day by the waiting lines at the entrance, is proof positive that vaudeville is not a necessary adjunct of the moving picture theater.

Good music is a feature at the Orchard. A permanent singer, a pleasing baritone, adds materially to the program with his illustrated songs.

A fine screen, a competent operator and the best of recent releases, assures clear pictures—while the manner in which the Orchard is conducted and the unvarying courtesy and thoughtfulness of all the people connected therewith, makes it one of the most attractive moving picture theaters in Chicago.

"WHY VAUDEVILLE WAS CALLED UPON."

Chicago, Ill., August 25, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs:—In answer to the article by Mr. C. W. Lawford, "Why Vaudeville Was Called Upon," published in your issue of August 27, I wish to state that vaudeville was called upon, because the motion picture industry had (and has still) too many exhibitors with a very poor knowledge of moving pictures, like Mr. Lawford, if he believes what he writes.

Mr. Lawford is wrong when he says that two years ago a party would say to another: "Let us go down to the moving pictures," and that to-day said party does not mention motion pictures, but vaudeville, and even asks: "How were the acts?" If we were to take a census of the motion picture theaters of two years ago and of to-day, we would find that at the very least 50 per cent. of the houses have thrown out vaudeville to show pictures only. In Chicago, in the district of the loop, we count ten motion picture houses. Two years ago they were all showing vaudeville. To-day one house, the Bijou, has discarded the pictures to stick to cheap vaudeville. Another house shows both vaudeville and pictures, while the balance of eight places show pictures only. The Gilmore, the Washington, the Senate, the Bell, the Garfield, the Elite, the Janet, the Orchard and many more of the Chicago houses have abandoned vaudeville. In the Windy City alone three-quarters of the houses are showing pictures only, so it is safe to say that fifty per cent. of the moving picture theaters of the United States have paid dearly for the folly of cheap vaudeville and have returned to the more sensible way of showing good pictures only. I have found that Detroit, Wilmington, Toledo, Cincinnati, Chester, Pittsburg, Baltimore, Indianapolis, Milwaukee and many other towns have followed the war against cheap vaudeville.

How can Mr. Lawford say that folks do not mention any more motion pictures when cheap vaudeville is dying out?

Mr. Lawford says; "To answer these questions intelligently and to appreciate the full meaning and value of such answers requires a deal of study and observation in the gentle art of human nature, both by the writer and his many readers. Speaking for the writer, eighteen years of experience before, and dealing with, that most fickle animal the public, I, unegotistically assume the responsibility for the answers, while you, as the reader, must exercise what intelligence God has seen fit to give you, together with your own knowledge acquired."

I do not see that it requires a deal of study and observation or eighteen years of experience, and as our friend Lawford tells me, as a reader, to exercise what intelligence God gave me, I am going to use such intelligence to show where Lawford is wrong.

Mr. Lawford says; "They easily tire of sameness, of stereotyped ways, abhorring ancient customs and continually demanding progress."

As all the manufacturers and renters will testify that the films after having made the tour of the circuit are not wanted, that repeaters are refused, the motion pictures cannot be accused of sameness, etc. On another hand, we know of vaudeville actors who have played the same parts for years. In a theater films are changed daily, while vaudeville is changed only twice a week, so the vaudeville should be accused of sameness and not the motion pictures.

I have seen vaudeville for thirty-five years of my life, in America, in London and in Paris. I have seen practically the same thing during these long years: An Irish jig—the fat German in a dialogue with an Irishman—very nearly the same songs—same dances—same trapeze acts—same instrument players—same jokes, etc.

On the other hand, I have followed the motion pictures for five years; every year it is something new, yes, every month, every week, every day, I see something new in the cinematographic theaters.

The wonderful stage founded by Moliere is a mere toy to motion pictures, at least at the point of view of Mr. Lawford, regarding ancient customs and asking for novelties. Most of the plays are staged from past centuries, and there is not a playhouse in the world able to give the realistic effects obtained by the moving pictures. The "Bear Hunting in Russia" by the Great Northern Film Company was a master production that no theater can show in the same manner. Yes, the stage of Drury Lane of London is large enough to paint a forest on canvas, but not the real woods of Russia and no real bears.

How about the "Logging" of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company? Can you find a playhouse to show such a novelty, educational as well as interesting—the logs carried by the rivers through dams, etc.? Could a regular theater show us the waters of the river rushing down when the dams are opened? In this Essanay film we have not the old customs of Louis XIV. or of Louis XV., we have novelties; we have the customs of the New World; we are shown these woodmen who are so little known to the world in general.

Could a theater give us so much of a novelty and yet instructive lesson as "The Fly Pest" of Gaumont, "The Acrobatic Fly," etc.?

I have spent over thirty-five years of my life touring Europe and America, reading books and newspapers, listening to lectures, and all this with comparatively a very meagre general knowledge of this wide world. In less than five years the motion pictures have gratified my desire of knowing more of our planet, from East to West and from South to North. The motion pictures took me in every clime of this globe, showed me the different people, the different customs, showed me the ocean, the lakes, the rivers, the waterfalls, the mountains, the glaciers, the valleys, the fields, the farms, the villages, the towns, the big cities, the universal development of navigation, the steamers, the warships, even the canoe of the Indian, the railroads, the automobiles, the airships, telegraphy, wireless, telephone, etc. The motion pictures took me in clinic rooms where I saw some of the most remarkable surgical operations, took me in the offices, in the industrial plants, in the mills, in the factories, in the laboratories, where I witnessed some wonderful experiments, etc. And all this for the modest sum of five or ten cents, without having to spend days and months in railroads cars. The motion pictures showed me how tea, cotton, coffee, cocoa, etc., were cultivated and prepared for our general comfort. Well, the program is entirely too long to be enumerated in these lines, and the best I can say is "that motion pictures are the best encyclopedia ever offered to this world."

With such a list of novelties, of varieties, of originalities, I do not understand Mr. Lawford when he tells us that motion picture are flat, lack novelty, and require a stupid jig or a foolish Irish-German act to make them acceptable. The stage, with several centuries of experience, has been unable to show us the truth, as all that is shown in a playhouse is pure imagination, nothing novel, nothing original. It is a composition prepared by a playwright, a mere fiction; staged and acted by men and women who make it a business to be unnatural, while the settings are painted on canvas from mere illusions, created by artists who never saw the scenes they try to depict.

Yet Mr. Lawford tells us that the stage giving only a very poor idea of nature does not need vaudeville as a drawing card, while the motion pictures, showing us on the screen real nature in its magnificence, must have vaudeville acts of the most silly character to draw in the crowds. In other words, Mr. Lawford in making such a statement seems to say that with our great educational system we are getting more dumb than ever and cannot understand the lessons taught us by motion pictures.

I have not the pleasure to know Mr. Lawford, but I can safely say that the inhabitants of the United States would have been very sorry if the exhibitors had replaced the admirable film of Gaumont called "The Poetry of the Waters" by a foolish Irish-German act. Yes, this "Poetry of the Waters" shows us the real ocean better than we can see it at Atlantic City, and the "Trawler Fishing in a Hurricane," also by Gaumont, shows us real boats tossed on high waves, real waves, waves that I had the pleasure to witness on a very stormy trip through the English channel, waves surpassing all imagination. Was it not a novelty for spectators to see on the screen boats nearly disappearing under such waves and waves surrounding the boats as high as mountains? I wish I had more time to quote more of these films as Selig, Pathe, Biograph, Essanay, Vitagraph, Eclair, Ambrosio, and many other manufacturers have shown us, novelties and originalities that cannot be duplicated on the stage, no matter the talent and experience of the managers.

To tell the truth, the cheap vaudeville was called upon by the pushcart men in the business in their ridiculous competition. That ilk did not look at the great opportunity before them; all they saw was a chance to beat out of business the legitimate showman, and so they adopted the cheap vaudeville, believing that if they could give a big program for little money, they would ruin their competitors. This time the pushcart man got his reward; he has been forced out of the game and to-day the honest and experienced showman is master of the situation, consequently cheap vaudeville is gradually expulsed from the moving picture theaters.

I do not claim a long experience. I talk from plain facts, and as I said, if we were to take a census of the moving picture theaters, we would see that at the present writing fifty per cent. of the houses have abandoned cheap vaudeville, to devote all their attention to good pictures, and we can predict that before another year vaudeville will be entirely banished, that vaudeville will be restored to the regular playhouses and the pictures will leave the vaudeville theaters. This reform is possible and will be accomplished now that the better classes are taking to motion pictures.

THE MODERN PRODIGAL

A Story in Symbolism Showing the Egotism of Youth

What young man is there who has not during his adolescence promised for himself a great future, and how many examples have we not of the calamitous result of this ominous self-esteem. This Biograph subject teaches a lesson to young men, who leave their homes, with the know-it-all mien to set the world ablaze with their cleverness. Compare them as the tallow candle with the arc light—bright and luminous in their own sphere, but apparently snuffed out in proximity with the arc. The young man of this story leaves his country home exclaiming as he points city ward: "There, mother, is my sphere; there will I turn the world over." It is the same with him as it was with the son of old who was glad to get back and feed even among his father's swine. There has never been a more powerful sermon than this picture.

STORIES OF THE FILMS

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE MODERN PRODIGAL.—Egotism is the most dangerous quality man can cultivate, for it makes us overconfident of our strength of purpose. Self-esteem is a fault that rarely goes unpunished. How few of us realize what weaklings we are without the guiding hand of the Great Master of all. In the opening of this subject we find the callow youth as he points towards the city's spires, exclaiming to his dear old mother "Mother, there in the big city is my sphere. There will I turn the world over." Off he goes cityward, ambitious and presumptuous, and perhaps we may add reckless. Alas, the city's whirl is quite a change from the simple quiet life in the country and the youth falls a victim to the snares that beset the unsophisticated. After a bitter experience, he returns, and in symbolism we show him in the raiment of sin—a convict's suit. Approaching his old home, he sees there in front of the door the old chair in which sat his mother on the day of his departure. What a difference! On that day there shone the sunshine of hope; to-day, the clouds of despair. As he regards himself in his prison garb, he utters that penitential cry of the ancient prodigal, "I am no more worthy to be called thy son." Turning away, he staggers about exhausted to the pigsty, where he eats ravenously the husks upon which the swine feed. At this point we show the other side—the watchful father and his son. The father is the sheriff and has just received the notice of a convict's escape and a reward offered for his capture, the poor convict, meanwhile, being hounded from place to place by the pursuing guards. The sheriff's young son yields to temptation and is guilty of stealing apples and then lies about it. For this the father chastises him, so in the spirit of rebellion, he goes swimming with his playmates. Here he is guilty of disobedience and is made to suffer. Going beyond his depth, he is carried by the swift running current into the rapids. The boy's drowning seems inevitable, but the cries of his companions are heard by the fugitive, who is hiding in the bushes by the side of the stream, and at the risk of his life and liberty he plunges into the seething torrent and drags the child to safety just as the father rushes up, having been informed of the child's peril. Here is an awkward situation. He is torn by conflicting inclinations. As father of the rescued boy, he owes the fugitive an immeasurable debt of gratitude, but as sheriff it is his duty to arrest the convict. Here is where duty is unreasonable. However, there is no compromise where duty is concerned, and he is forced to perform it, odious though it be. At his home he leaves the prisoner in charge of his wife while he gets his carriage. The mother allowing maternal love to guide her feelings, feigns sleep that the prisoner may escape with a suit of civilian clothes, and return to his own despairing mother. As the poor unfortunate approaches his home, his mother, stretching forth her hands, exclaims: "My son was dead and is alive again; he was lost, and is found."

THE AFFAIR OF AN EGG.—Have you ever when you ordered "medium boiled in the shell," anticipated that these same hen products may hatch out a delightful romance? No? Well, here is an occasion of a near-romance—"near" because it was a trifle side-tracked. A romantic rustic maiden, while gathering the fruit of the nests for market, conceived the bright idea of sending a tender missive with her name and address on one of the eggs, relying upon Cupid delivering it to the affined one. But Cupid fell asleep at the switch, and the next we see of the egg is when it is served at a restaurant to a young man. Espying the writing thereon, he at once repairs to the address given. At this address he meets an old maid of fifty, fondling a cat. To his query she answers that the lady in question resides here and that she is the lady. No, this is not possible for the lady he asks for is the one whose name is written on the egg. Here is where the romance is scrambled, for she tells him that she wrote that when she was a girl many years ago. You see the poor maiden knew nothing of cold storage where the egg had reposed all those years.

MUGGSY BECOMES A HERO.—When we left Muggsy in our last subject he had just redeemed himself with his sweetheart Mabel. Hence it is that when Mabel is requested by mamma to accompany her to the church meeting, she sends him a note asking him to meet her after service and he may walk home with her. Muggsy is there on time all right, but fate conspires again. The sisters Frost, two spinsters, on their way to church, were accosted by a couple of burly tramps who frightened the poor old ladies so that they were afraid to make the return trip unaccompanied. So the pastor asks that some of the men escort them. Poor Muggsy is hooked, much to his chagrin, and when the trio reach the deserted part of the road the tramps again appear. Muggsy assures the ladies of his protection, so to fear not. This declaration the tramps regard as a joke. Well the affair is on, and although Muggsy next appears in a torn, dishevelled condition his opponents have to be carried bodily to the cooler—both knocked out. Mabel is justly proud of her Muggsy.

THE MAN WHO LEARNED. The first scene shows the milking of the cows in the old, careless way, the milkers with unwashed hands and the cows just as they come from the pastures. Even the pails, beyond the casual scalding or washing out, are not in very perfect condition. A young man, the son-in-law of the proprietor of the old-fashioned dairy goods farm, protests against these conditions and against the poor pasturage the cows have. His father-in-law rather objects to the criticism of methods which have the sanction of precedent. He has carried on the business for thirty years in the same way and sees no sense in the new-fangled ideas. The quarrel grows in the kitchen of the farm house where an untidy maid is using dirty towels to wipe the cans, and finally reaches a climax when the younger man points out the shipping of the milk in an open wagon in the broiling sun without ice or protection. The father-in-law invites him to stop his criticism or leave the old farm. The young man accepts the latter invitation, and taking with him his young wife and baby, the latter the idol of the old man's heart, he goes away. The old man is obstinate even in the face of this separation.

City conditions and living do not agree with the little grandson and in a short time the child falls ill. The doctor is called in and rather shakes his head at the child's condition. Then we see the young mother on the street. She notices a sign which reads: "Old-Fashioned Dairy Goods." It recalls the old farm and the milk, and she thinks that possibly some would be good for the sick baby. She gets a pail from the storekeeper, and he ladles out from the open can some of the milk which she takes back to the little apartment. It doesn't seem any too clean being ladled out in this way, so she strains it and then feeling sure that it is all right gives it to the child.

And then the next scene shows us that the little one's condition is critical. The doctor, after asking what food has been given the child, makes a brief test and discovers that the milk is lacking in quality and not sanitary, and is probably responsible for the child's serious condition.

News of the child's illness then reaches the farm, and the old man, fairly beside himself with anxiety, forgets his quarrel, and packing up his things hurries off to the city. Arriving there he pushes past the anxious father, kisses the mother and bends over the bed of the little grandson. Then he demands of the doctor the cause of the child's illness. The doctor tells him it is the milk. The grandfather turns angrily upon the father with a demand to know why such milk was given the child. Of course, there is only one answer—the milk came from the old man's own farm and is a result of his unsanitary methods. The child's illness is directly traceable to his own obstinacy and carelessness and his unwillingness to learn modern ways. And then, at the hour of the crisis when the child must either live or pass away, the old man realizes his fault, and he kneels in thankfulness when the child's life is finally spared.

He returns to the old farm, and a little later the convalescent baby gets a characteristic note from "grandpa," inviting him to come and bring his father and mother with him to see some new things at the farm. The father refuses to go, but the mother takes the baby and we next see them back in the old kitchen, which is now clean and kept by a tidy maid, the slovenly one having transformed herself. Then follow successive scenes about the farm in which the cows have beautiful new pastures of picturesque value, rich in tall grass and running brooks. And in the dairy the milking is all done by white-suited men, whose hands have been carefully inspected, and the cows are sprayed, cleaned with vacuum cleaners, brushed and washed before the milking. The milk is never handled at all, but after being poured into the cans is sent on a trolley across to the strainer. From there it goes to the cooling machine and is bottled by another ingenious machine, which puts the caps on without the touch of a human hand. Even the bottles are cleaned and sterilized by machinery. Everything is white and clean and sanitary, and, as the mother writes, even the little grandson approves of the changes.

The picture ends with the coming of the young man, the baby's father, and with his recognition that the old man's apology has taken the best possible form. A reunited family brings the story to a close and shows us a healthy baby and a happy outcome of all the trials and troubles.

THE BIG SCOOP.—This film depicts the thrilling dramatic incident in the life of one Jim Connors, a crack reporter on one of the large New York dailies. Connors is immensely popular with all the newspaper fraternity, but unfortunately for himself he is addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors, which fact often incapacitates him from properly attending to his duties. The night city editor under whom he works is very patient with him at all times, till an infraction of the office rules is the last straw and Jim is summarily discharged by him.

We see Connor's home life. His wife and little girl are very fond of him, and it is a sad picture to see the beloved father and husband coming into his home in an intoxicated condition. When Connors tells his wife that he has been discharged she does not show as much anxiety over that fact as over his condition. The next day [illegible] to his proper senses and at the [illegible] his wife promises to give up drink. Having made this resolution, he calls on the city editor and asks to be reinstated. Thinking that [illegible] old story repeated, the editor refuses to put Jim back to work. Connors appeals to the managing editor, it is useless as he stands by his subordinate.

In a dejected mood Connors leaves the office. He strolls down to the business streets of New York and in an aimless sort of way reaches the banking section, hoping for some bit of information which might be of such value as to enable him to get a good story and place it with one of the papers. He has a fruitless afternoon and late that night is sitting in a cafe eating a light repast, when he overhears two men evidently bankers discussing in an earnest way some startling [illegible]. As they rise to leave the place one of them loses a paper containing a set of figures, and, after their departure Connors picks up the paper. He can make nothing of the figures, but in the hope of something resulting follows the men from the cafe and through the banking streets of lower New York until they enter the side door of the Consolidated Trust Company. The door is closed immediately after their entrance, and Connors is prevented from seeing into the building by the shade being drawn just as he is about to look through the window.

The lateness of the hour and the anxiety of the men make him feel certain that he is on the trail of a big "scoop." His reporter's instinct makes him positive of it. He therefore determines to get into the bank in some way and raps loudly on the window. This brings the night watchman to the scene, who demands to know what he wants. Connors informs him that he has a document which belongs to the gentlemen who have just entered, and the watchman brings him into the bank.

In the upper room meanwhile the directors, the treasurer, the cashier and several officers of the bank are in consultation with the State examiner, who is examining the standing of the bank and the condition of its affairs with a view to suspending the business. Connors is ushered into this room, and the cashier and president are greatly relieved at finding the figures which they have lost. The excitement attendant upon the discussion of these very figures makes every one in the room lose sight of Connors. He realizes that his stay must be short, and he thinks rapidly. The telephone is on the table near the chair of the bank examiner, and he concludes that this will be a good means of hearing what is going on in the room without being personally present. Quickly cutting the end from a pen holder he inserts it under the hook of the telephone on which hangs the ear trumpet, thereby leaving the 'phone in operation. Replacing the trumpet, which is prevented from closing the connection by reason of the plug which he has inserted, Connors leaves the room. The bank switchboard is at the foot of the stairs on his way out, and he requests the watchman to allow him the privilege of telephoning to a friend. This the watchman at first refuses to do, but on Connors becoming graciously insistent he finally consents.

As the watchman proceeds on his rounds through the bank Connors hears what is going on in the room above, particularly what is said by the bank examiner, and the result is most startling. Fortunately the watchman does not return until he has heard the finish of the bank examiner's assertion that he will close the bank on the following morning at 10 o'clock. Adjusting the switchboard so that he can call the central office Connors rings up the office of the paper from which he has just been discharged and tells them he has a big "scoop" and will report to the office. At this juncture the watchman returns and he is forced to hang up the receiver. The message reaches the newspaper office where it causes great excitement for the reason that it is within twenty minutes of the hour at which the paper must go to press. A heated argument is precipitated between the night city editor and Jerry Smith, a close pal of Connors. The night city editor does not wish to stop the paper from going to press at the usual hour, and rather belittles the idea of Connors having a "scoop." Jerry Smith supports his friend in the matter, and the question of whether he will be given time or not is finally decided by the city editor allowing him until a few minutes of 1 o'clock to arrive at the office.

We now follow Jim Connors in his effort to get to the reporters' room on time. Flash scenes between the room and the action of Jim on the street make a very exciting story. Jim wins in the race and secures the big "scoop" for his paper. The night city editor and the managing editor are both present when he breathlessly announces the news which their paper alone will cast abroad in the early hours of that very morning.

Jim accepts the congratulations of his fellows but declines their proffered hospitality, and goes to his home and to the fond little wife who has been waiting all these hours for him. His long delay has made her worry and fear that perhaps Jim has again fallen from grace. She has given way to sleep, and her head is reclining on the table when Jim enters the room. She is at first doubtful when startled from her sleep, but the glad tidings which Jim gleefully imparts to her awakens her to a full realization of the welcome fact that her husband has "made good" in more ways than one.

ALICE'S ADVENTURES IN WONDERLAND. Alice and her big sister are sitting on the side of a hill overlooking the lake, the big sister busy with her book. Before long we see the little girl's eyes grow heavy and she readily begins to see things, the first being the rabbit. Alice's friend and guide in her travels. We see him take a watch out of his waistcoat pocket, look at it and then hurry on. Alice starts to her feet as it evidently flashes through her mind that she has never before seen a rabbit with either a waistcoat pocket or a watch to take out of it, and burning with curiosity she runs across the fields after it just in time to see it pop down a large rabbit hole under the hedge. In another minute Alice goes in after it, never once considering how in the world she can get out again.

Then the scene shifts and we see her falling down the rabbit hole. Either it is very deep or she falls very slowly, for she has plenty of time to look about her as she falls down, down, down. She wonders how many miles she has fallen and thinks she must be getting somewhere near the center of the earth. Then suddenly she falls into a mysterious hall with doors all around it. The doors are all locked and when Alice goes all the way down one side and up the other, trying every door, she realizes that she cannot get out of the hall.

Suddenly then she comes upon the little three-legged glass table with nothing on it but a tiny key. She tries the key in all the doors of the hall, but alas! either there are no locks on the doors, or they are too small or too large. Then she notices a little door about fifteen inches high at the bottom of one of the big ones, tries the little golden key, and to her great delight it fits the lock. She opens the door and looks out through its passage into the loveliest little garden ever. She longs to get out of the dark hall, to wander among those beds of bright flowers and those cool fountains, but she cannot even get her head through the doorway.

Next we see her close the door and, returning to the table, lay the key on it. And then she discovers a mysterious bottle which bears the words "Drink Me." When she has taken a drink from the bottle she finds herself growing smaller and smaller, shutting up like a telescope. When she is ten inches high she can go through the little door, but now the key is high above her head on the table. The effect of Alice's change in size is very happily carried out and conveys the illusion perfectly.

Next we see her eat the wonderful cake which makes her grow tall enough so that she can get the key again. But then she does not stop growing, but keeps on until she fills the entire hall and begins to cry with grief at her inability to stop. She cries a whole pool of tears and incontinently tumbles into it. We see her splashing about and then crawling out of the pool as dry as if water were not wet at all. Then the rabbit reappears, very tiny compared to Alice now and passes her, disappearing down the end of the hall. He leaves a little fan behind him, which Alice picks up and which has the same effect as the wonderful liquid in the bottle. She begins to grow small again and finally is able to pass through the little door into the beautiful garden.

Then follows the scene with the enormous puppy, who looks down at her with large, round eyes and seems to try to play with her. She is so tiny beside the puppy that he looks like an elephant. She takes up a stick to play with him and is almost sorry when he runs away and leaves her. She should have liked teaching him tricks very much, if she had only been the right size to do it.

Then she wanders on until she comes upon a little house about four feet high. While she stands looking at it and wondering what to do next a footman in livery suddenly comes out of the woods. She judges him a footman only because he is in livery; otherwise, judging from his face, she would call him a fish. He raps loudly at the door, which is opened by another footman in livery, with a round face and large eyes like a frog, and both footmen bow ceremoniously. The fish footman begins by producing from under his arm a great letter, an invitation from the Queen to the Duchess, after delivering which both footmen bow low and the fish man disappears into the woods, while the other sits down on the ground near the door staring stupidly into the sky.

At this moment the door of the house opens and a large plate comes skimming out straight at the footman's head. It just grazes his nose and breaks to pieces against one of the trees behind him. It is followed by several others which narrowly miss him, and Alice decides that she must go into the house and find out what it's all about. The little door leads right into a large kitchen full of smoke from one end to the other. The Duchess sits on a three-legged stool nursing the baby. The cook is leaning over the fire stirring a large cauldron which seems to be full of soup, and there certainly seems to be too much pepper in the soup for they all sneeze as the cook flourishes the pepper pot. In fact, the only people in the room that don't sneeze are the cook and the large cat which is sitting on the hearth, grinning from ear to ear. It is Alice's first meeting with the Cheshire cat. Then suddenly the cook sets to work throwing everything within her reach at the Duchess and the baby—fire irons, dishes, saucepans and plates. The Duchess takes no notice of them even when they hit her, and the baby howls so much that it is impossible to say whether the blows hurt it or not. Then the Duchess gets up, throws the baby to Alice and dances off.

Then we see Alice carry the baby out into the woods which she suddenly realizes that some change has come over it. She looks down at it as nobody ever has less than a pig. She feels that it would be quite absurd for her to carry it any farther, so she sets the little creature down and is quite relieved to see it trot away quietly into the woods. It has hardly disappeared from the scene when the Cheshire cat dimly appears upon the limb of a tree and smiles down at Alice. While Alice is talking to it the cat disappears and reappears again, which is very disconcerting to her.

In the next scene Alice has come to the home of the March Hare. There is a table set out under the tree, and the March Hare and the Hatter are having tea at it, a Dormouse sitting between them fast asleep. The other two are using it as a cushion, resting their elbows on it and talking over its head. The table is a large one but the three are all crowded together in one corner. They tell her that there is no room for Alice, but she indignantly tells them that there is room and sits down in a large armchair at one end of the table. It certainly is a mad tea party, for they drop everything into the teapot and soon we see the Hatter take out his watch and look at it anxiously, shaking it now and then and holding it to his ear. Then we see him put butter in the works and indicate no when Alice protests that it is the best butter obtainable. As this fails to make the watch go, he dips it into his cup of tea and finally ends by putting it in the teapot. This is too much for Alice and she beats a retreat. The last she sees of the three, the March Hare and the Hatter are putting the Dormouse into the teapot after the watch.

Then comes the garden of roses and the croquet grounds of the King and Queen of Hearts where we are introduced to their majesties and to the Knave with the family of Heart children. This scene is followed by a banquet at which the dastardly Knave steals the tarts and gets away with them, as told in the familiar rhyme. Although Alice is the only one to see him, she refuses to tell, even when summoned to the trial, which takes place in the next scene.

The first witness is the Mad Hatter, who nervously bites a piece out of his tea cup when called upon to testify and takes off his shoes instead of his hat in respect to their majesties. The cook with her pepper box is another witness. She makes them sneeze but refuses to give any valuable evidence. Then comes Alice, the last witness, who angers their majesties by her refusal to convict the Knave, and who protests at the idea of sentencing him without going through the formality of finishing the trial. She braves the angry Queen, who can plainly be seen ordering Alice's head cut off. Then, as in the book, Alice indicates that she doesn't care for them and that she knows that they are nothing but a pack of cards; at which sign the whole pack rises into the air, the people changing to real cards and coming flying down upon her and about her head. She tries to beat them off and in so doing wakes herself up to find herself again upon the hillside with the big sister gently brushing away the dead leaves that have fluttered down on to her face.

THE MILLIONAIRE AND THE RANCH GIRL.—Nellie Blair and her father, an invalid, are in hard circumstances, due to the long illness of the latter. They have mortgaged their ranch and the mortgage is held by a young millionaire in a distant city, a local agent, however, representing him. Howell the agent, an unscrupulous and crafty schemer, loves Nellie, and having proposed to her unsuccessfully, finally resolves to make use of the mortgage which he, by law, may foreclose at any time.

Howell calls on the old man and insists on being paid. Blair deplores his lack of funds and begs for more time. Howell leaves, finally, with a half way promise to let the matter stand for a few days, and on his way back to town encounters Nellie. He again presses his suit, but she scorns him, and when he turns on her with blazing eyes, showing her the mortgage and threatening her with the loss of her home, she brands him a coward and hurries away sobbing.

Some few days later Milton Rodd, the young millionaire, in his office in the city, receives word from Howell explaining in highly exaggerated terms the flat refusal of Blair to pay the mortgage. Rodd immediately writes Howell and in the body of the letter orders him to collect the mortgage, but adds a significant postscript to the effect: "But if they are financially unable to meet this, give them all the time they desire."

This letter plays an important part in Howell's campaign for the girl's hand, and presents a strong situation in the story. The crafty agent tears off the postscript and presents to Blair merely the body of the letter, which orders the agent to evict Blair and his daughter upon refusal to pay.

The next day the old man and his daughter are evicted, and are forced to take up their abode in a tent. Howell again comes on the scene with his promises and temptations, but Nellie orders him away.

Milton Rodd at this time suffers a breakdown from overwork, and is advised by his physician to go to the country for a rest. Having heard of the eviction of the Blairs, he resolves to make the

A GAME WITH FAME. It is the story of a young woman living in a country town who is so ambitious for a literary career that she forsakes her lover and her family and goes to the city to take a position on a magazine. Her work catches on immediately and she quickly secures a position of considerable importance in the Bohemian life of the big city. In the excitement of her successful career she utterly forgets the folks she left at home. Even her lover is overlooked in the excitement of the game and she becomes betrothed to a man of the world who is interested in her for her position rather than her personality. In the meantime the girl's eyes have been giving out and she becomes practically blind. New York specialists give up her case as useless and in her distress all her Bohemian friends desert her, even her new found fiance. THE MAN WHO DIED. James Jardine is wealthy, but he would willingly give his money to regain his health, though the best surgeons have pronounced his paralysis incurable. William Jardine, his graceless brother, comes as a self-invited guest and usurps to himself the rights of the household, and even comes to regard James as an intruder. He is rather well pleased when it is believed that the helpless man has rolled into the lake, and takes complete possession of his legacy. But James Jardine was not drowned. As he sat in his wheel chair a couple of automobilists, with alcoholic kindliness, decided to give the invalid a ride, and in raising him to put him into the car they knocked the chair into the lake. Soon they tired of their company and unceremoniously dumped him beside the road, where he is found by Dr. Griggs. Griggs tells Jardine that his paralysis is curable, and while the treatment is being given Jardine gives no hint to his brother. Love comes with health and Alice Griggs goes with him as his bride when he returns home. He is not a welcome visitor when he arrives, for Bill is riotously enjoying himself with some of his boon companions, and does not relish being turned out of the house with but a small allowance. But James is mindful of the many insults and annoyances and the time of reckoning has come.

GAUMONT.
(George Kleine.)

YVONNE'S SACRIFICE.—Yvonne, a fair maiden, and her widowed mother find lodging in cosy rooms among the middle class dwellers of Paris and soon become well acquainted with the people of the neighborhood.

Mother and daughter both fall in love with an elderly gentleman living in the apartments next to their's, but unfortunately for Yvonne, it is her mother whom the elderly gentleman loves. After we watch the progress of the courtship as carried on in several beautiful nooks of that great city the mother writes telling her daughter that she has made up her mind to marry her neighbor. Yvonne is overcome with grief and after a time makes up her mind to leave them and spend the rest of her life in a convent. After writing a short note of farewell to her mother we see her bravely packing up her few treasures and leaving the home.

FOUR LITTLE TAILORS.—The opening scene is in a tailor's shop, showing the four assistants more or less in love with their employer's daughter. After some time, the tailor says he will give his daughter to the one who shows himself to be the cleverest. Some very amusing incidents follow.

In keen competition we see them all trying to perform the most difficult tasks, in order to win the much-cherished reward. They attempt to sew without thread, and without a needle, and also to sew the wing of a fly. The last man, however, fulfills the desired tasks, and is duly accepted by the daughter.

The various feats accomplished during the contest are clever examples of trick photography. The sewing without thread and without needle are both shown greatly magnified.

"The man who leaves fancy devices and useless tricks alone, sticking to his trade, wins the bride," is the moral tacked to this story.

THE VOW; OR, JEPHTHAH'S DAUGHTER.—Jephthah, the ninth judge of the Israelites, a natural son of Gilead, of the tribe of Manasseh, was expelled from his home by his brothers, at the death of his father, on account of his illegitimate birth. He withdrew to the land of Tob, where he became the chief of a band of brigands. Later on, when the Israelites resolved to oppose the Ammonites, they invited Jephthah to become their commander. He accepted the invitation on condition that he should remain their ruler if he defeated the Ammonites. When setting forth against the enemy, Jephthah, who perhaps feared that the Lord would not favor him on account of his past, made a solemn vow to the Lord that if he returned victorious he would offer up for a burnt offering whatsoever first "came forth from the doors of his house" to meet him. When Jephthah's daughter, an only child, heard of her father's victory and return she rushed to meet him and was the first person to "come forth from Jephthah's house."

IN THE PYRENEES.—A combination of scenic and spectacular subjects most unusually and originally set forth.

Romantic scenes on the banks of mountain streams revealing fresh beauties of majestic nature at every turn.

The chiseling and modeling of rain and frost continuously presented in wonderful arched and fantastic designs.

Nestling among the trees at the foot of great hills are the picturesque huts of peasants and ruins of old castles.

A film which makes the audience wish it were of greater length.

THE SHEPHERD AND THE MAID.—A party of tourists go mountaineering one morning, and a lady of their number becomes separated from the others and falls down a cliff, without, however, any serious injury. Her cries are heard by a mountain shepherd, who, guided by the sound of her voice, finds her. He informs her father, and takes the girl back to the house at which she lives. The shepherd receives their thanks, but he has conceived a great liking for the young lady, which is returned. The separation proves unhappy for both. The last scene is forty years afterwards. They have not forgotten their parting and the vision of their one kiss rises before their eyes.

ANCIENT CASTLES OF AUSTRIA.—From Modling to Hinterbruhl by electric railway—a few moments' ride among a strange assembly of natural scenes immediately contrasted with works of a commercial nature. Castle of the Duke of Leichtenstein, a magnificent structure suggestive of the days of romantic knighthood; it is situated on a high cliff above a beautiful valley. Ruins of an old castle on a steep hillside overlooking a silver stream which flows between forest-covered banks. The Black Tower, another famous landmark of this vicinity; now only a few imperfect arches mark the place where once grandees and ladies fair were wont to gather.

ESCAPE OF THE ROYALISTS.—Croche, a revolutionary spy, surprises a party of noblemen, who are planning flight. Overhearing their arrangements, he follows them unseen to the seashore. The beautiful daughter of a Revolutionist gives her jewels to the fugitives to assist their escape. Failing to arrest either of the men Croche seizes the girl, compelling a young officer to take her as prisoner to a neighboring inn. Impressed by her beauty, the officer assists her to escape.

Followed by a crowd of excited Revolutionists, Croche gives chase, captures the girl and drags her to prison. Her protector tells his story to the chief of police, imploring him to grant her freedom. He obtains a signed pardon, and permission to marry his protege. Returning to the prison, Croche finds our hero leading forth his captive in triumph.

BUYING A BEAR.—A happy party of holiday seekers get into a street brawl with a flower seller and consequently are taken in charge and trotted off to the police station. Owing to the absence of the chief inspector release is refused them under any pretext.

Shortly afterwards, some traveling showmen, accompanied by a bear, are brought in for the inspection of their papers. On learning the nature of the newcomers' calling, the friends offer a good sum for the exchange of costumes in order to get out of their predicament. The papers being found in order, they are duly set free, accompanied by the bear.

All would have gone well if the bear had behaved, but finding himself in strange hands he starts having high jinks of his own. Finally, the police once again interfere, and finding that the bear has imbibed rather too freely, procure a barrow on which he is taken without friends to the station.

On full explanation, the bear is restored to his original owners, who, after being severely rebuked, are set at liberty.

THE ROMANCE OF CIRCLE RANCH.—Getting his laundry from the Chinaman, "Honest Jim" spruces himself up in preparation to make a call on "Bess," with whom he is in love. Calling at Circle Ranch, her home, he finds Jack Rance making overtures to her father for "Bess'" hand. She greets Jim pleasantly, but she dislikes Jack; there is something about him which is distasteful to her and when her father intercedes for him she leaves the porch and hurries into the house.

She does not have to wait very long to see "Jim" and "Jack" in their true colors and make a choice between the two. The clergyman of the ranch settlement and the surrounding country comes to the post office where a crowd of cowboys are gathered to receive their mail. Jack approaches him saying, "Dance, d—n you, dance!" The minister refuses and Jack shoots a revolver at his feet and the godly man is obliged to do the light fantastic to the great amusement of the rest of the boys.

The next victim of the bully's pranks is the Chinese laundryman, whom Jack taunts, kicking over his basket of laundry, and, when the "chink" resents the insult, Jack makes a lunge at him which is intercepted by "Honest Jim," who knocks the bully down. Bess is a witness of these doings and then and there selects the better man.

Jack receives a letter announcing that he has won out in a claim for a mine and is now a rich man. At once he goes to Bess' father, shows him the letter. The father calls Bess in the room and Jack shows her the letter. She throws it upon the floor in disgust. Bess tells her father that she has made up her mind and will marry Jim. He tells her he will not consent to the match, she must marry Jack; then commands her to go to her room.

She decides to elope with Jim, sees the Chinaman passing the window and gives him a note telling Jim to meet her at the three-mile turn of the road, bring a clergyman and they will get married despite every opposition. The note is delivered. Jim gets "Sam Sung" to go for the clergyman. Glad to get square with Jack for his chastisement, Sam and the clergyman are only too glad to offer their services to the happy pair. All hands meet at the appointed place, the ceremony is nearly completed when Jack and Bess' father, who have discovered the girl's flight, are seen approaching in hot pursuit.

The eloping party jump on their horses and the marriage is consummated by the minister as they are riding at full gallop. The ride is a hot one and full of excitement. You can't help urging the horses on and you find yourself moving up and down with the motion of their pace; it is some ride, you must admit. When the horses are brought to a halt the father and Jack learn that Jim and Bess are one. The father, after all, is not displeased, forgives his daughter, welcomes Jim as his son-in-law while Jack slinks off, vanquished and smarting under the derisive laugh of the Chinaman and the smile of satisfaction beaming from the placid features of the parson.

WON IN THE FIFTH.—He has fought his last fight and the prize-ring will know the old pugilist no more. Knocked out by an organic disease, he is in a bad way not only physically but financially. He has an interesting daughter, a bright boy and a good wife who are well thought of by the people of the neighborhood in which they live, among whom is a young minister.

The doctor who attends the old boxer sees that nothing but a complete change to some warmer climate will benefit the patient and also recognizes that under the circumstances the change would be impossible unless someone comes to his assistance with the necessary money to defray the expense. The physician writes a note to the young clergyman telling him of his diagnosis of the case and his conclusions.

The young divine hastens to see the sick man. On his way he passes a theater in front of which there is this announcement: "$500 will be given to any middleweight who will meet the middleweight champion, Denny Dooley, and last five rounds; bout immediately after regular performance tonight." An idea comes to the minister, who has been a noted college athlete: If the worst comes to the worst, he will meet the champion and try to win the five hundred dollars and give them to the old pugilist to defray the expense of sending him away for treatment to some health resort.

Changing his general appearance, laying aside the evidences of his calling, the young man attends the show that evening and impatiently awaits the appearance of Denny Dooley. The manager announces the champion middleweight and makes the five hundred dollar offer to anyone who will meet him and last five rounds. The minister steps on the stage and says he would like to try. The contest begins and the first round is an even break. Round after round is fought; in the third the minister gets warmed up, shows his class, and in the fifth round gets one over on the jaw of his opponent, knocking him out, winning the bout and the five hundred dollars. The next day he goes to the sick man's home, presents him with the money, thus giving his friend a chance for health and life and gaining the gratitude of the family as well as the hand and heart of the daughter.

PATHE FRERES.

MEMENTO OF THE PAST.—The apple of her father's eye, the brightest thing her mother knows, little Violet's sudden illness and death are a shock to her parents that created sad havoc in their lives. Their love and tenderness for their child was their sheet anchor, and without her the sweetness of life is changed into bitterness and gall. He drowns his misery in drink while she shrives with her needle. Weary of the life, the woman at length decides to leave her husband. She is packing up a few articles of clothing when the man enters with a sneer on his lips and a jeer in his voice to mock at her. He makes no attempt to stay her until the sight of a toy, the doll which Violet had clasped in her arms as she lay dying, gives birth to another violent quarrel. Both claim this last memento of their child, and both clutch desperately at it, hate in their two faces drawn close together in the struggle, cruel malice and resentment betokened in their whole attitude—a pitiful sight indeed until the tension is suddenly and spontaneously broken by a sob, as the memory of their child touches some forgotten spring in the minds of both, making the hard faces to relax, the clutching fingers to straighten, and the lines of the mouth to soften, as husband and wife, with a sudden cry for mutual sympathy and forbearance, cling to each other in a close embrace.

KIDS WILL BE KIDS.—Dick and Lucy are cautioned by their parents, who are about to go out, to do their lessons and be good children. The two youngsters promise and open their books before them. The door, however, has scarcely shut, before they have commenced a series of somersaults, jumps and other startling acrobatic feats, which continue uninterruptedly until a ring is heard at the door. The parents have returned and when they enter the room they find the children with their heads buried in their books, hard at work at their studies.

ADVERTISING FOR A WIFE.—Louis Conroy thought when he inherited his father's comfortable fortune and took a little apartment of his own, that he had everything that he could [illegible]. But he was soon disillusioned, and found that he needed a wife to complete his happiness. Louis was a man of action, and the idea no sooner occurred to him, than he had written and taken to the local newspaper for insertion an ad stating that applicants for the position of wife to a handsome, rich young man should apply the following day. Time, on his way home it caused him to ponder when he saw a family of six boys, but they passed on their way quickly. Next day Jerome avenue was astir. All sorts and kinds of women were making for the Conroy apartment. Louis got a glimpse of them from the window, that was enough for him, and after a moment's thought he discovered a way to get rid of the surging mass of applicants. He burnt some cork and colored his hands and face. Entering his parlor, he asked for the first to be shown in. She did not at first see his face, but when she did, what an uproar there was. She rushed out and told the mob waiting outside that it was a colored man that had advertised, and the way they left that house would have done credit to a rat pursued by a terrier. One colored woman remained, however, and she was now shown in and was delighted to find his visage to be jet black. Falling on him and kissing him, she noticed that white appeared where she kissed him, and his trickery being thus exposed she left after administering a few blows of no gentle character. Mary, the maid, ascertaining that he had been unable to select a wife, came to the conclusion that it was up to her, so, disguising herself in a cloak and heavy veil, she entered the parlor. Louis was at once attracted by her pretty figure, and when she fetched his pipe and lit a match for him, he came to the conclusion that he had obtained the right girl. When he discovered who she was, it did not alter his opinion and he gave her the ring he had purchased in anticipation of getting engaged to someone that day.

SAVED FROM RUIN. John Mortimer is staying with his wife, Marian, and her sister Beatrice at Monte Carlo, and is fast ruining himself at the gambling tables. Claud Charlton is a great admirer of Marian, and one day, seeing her husband lose his fortune at the Casino, he despatches a note to her that if she will meet him he will advance her husband sufficient to set him on his feet. Beatrice, who has noticed Claud's attitude towards her sister, is suspicious when the note comes by messenger, and opens it. Heartbroken at learning of her brother-in-law's misfortune, she decides to keep the appointment herself. At the appointed time, heavily veiled, she meets Claud, but a gust of wind allows her partially concealed face to be seen, and Claud, greatly surprised, hears the whole story. He is generous hearted enough to reassure the trembling girl, and advances Mortimer the money for the sake of one whom he says he has found to be an angel in disguise and whom he decides to marry.

MAGGIE HOOLIHAN GETS A JOB.—Maggie Hoolihan, fresh landed from Ellis Island, having just come over from one of the little villages in the remote west of Ireland, was anxious to immediately commence to make her fortune, so she applied at Mr. Jinks' house in Jersey City for a job as maid. Having a very strong recommendation from the priest of her native village, she was soon installed in this position. While the family are out she incidentally brushes Jinks' coat with the carpet sweeper and drops it in the street. This attracts the attention of Officer Clancy, who, looking up, sees her fresh rosy cheeks. It does not take him long to make up his mind to go in, and the two soon become fast friends, and Maggie invites him to stay to supper. This was her undoing, for the Jinks family returns, find Clancy and Maggie sitting in the parlor eating the succulent meal that they had returned to partake of, and it took but a few moments for Jinks to throw them both out. Clancy then uses his influence to get Maggie a job, and takes her first to a laundry, where she soon has to leave in a hurry when she hurts another employee with her hot iron and also ruins some very fancy lingerie. Thinking to keep her under his own eye, he next gets the captain of the precinct to give her a job as scrubwoman at the station house, but when she unlocks the cell doors and allows the prisoners to escape, it is easy to see that this is not her sphere. Finally Clancy decides to marry her and to give her a permanent job for life, and he accordingly takes her to his home and introduces her to his children, only ten in all not counting the dog. Here she settles down and looking after this family keeps her busy while she leaves it to Clancy to get together the fortune she hoped to make.

THE EMIGRANT.—"The Emigrant" will be offered with the hope and the confidence that it will serve as another strong "friend maker" for the Diamond S trade mark. In this picture Selig has gone to the steerage of a trans-Atlantic liner to take up the first threads of his story. He follows a party of emigrants to Chicago, where they are being unloaded from a railroad train and sent to their respective destinations. One of their number wearing an identification card in his hat which bears the information that he is "L. Jacoby going to Omaha, Neb.," becomes confused and is lost in the crowd.

Realizing that he is alone—a stranger in a strange land, and being unable to make himself understood by word of mouth, he wanders through the city until by chances to meet a stranger who will stop long enough to read his card and put him on his way. The stranger is kind. He travels gives him his last few dollars to pay for transportation to Omaha. He is taken to an overheard railway and shoved aboard the train.

He turns to thank his benefactor and finds himself alone, speeding over the city in an "L" train with his new found friend and his money gone. We meet him again at the "L" terminus. Heartsick and weary, he takes up his aimless wandering; he is attacked and injured by a gang of street hoodlums when two good Samaritans, in the persons of a big-hearted Irishwoman and her son, take him, wounded and bleeding, into their home, where they nurse him back to health and give him his first insight into true Americanism.

He has become a good and respected citizen of our United States, adversity has set a heavy hand upon his Irish benefactress and her son. He repays them in a way that will make you glad.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

A LIFE FOR A LIFE. A strange attachment, akin to love, has been formed by a convict for a rat which he has caught and tamed and of which he has grown very fond. It is the only living thing he cares for and which cares for him, and in the solitude of his cell the companionship of the rodent gives the poor fellow a great deal of comfort and pleasure.

One of the keepers of the prison sees the prisoner playing with the rat, rushes into the cell, dashes the animal to the floor and kills it. The convict seizes the keeper by the throat, strangles and almost kills him. He is brought before the warden and placed in solitary confinement.

A visiting clergyman, a friend of the warden, is escorted through the prison, in company with the warden's wife and child. When they enter the cell of the convict placed in solitary confinement they find him morose and sullen, grieving over the loss of his friend and companion and the injustice of the whole human race. The clergyman speaks to him kindly and the warden's little daughter sympathizes with him, while her mother looks at him with pity.

His heart is somewhat mellowed by these evidences of consideration, and when the clergyman visits his cell the second time, by permission of the warden, the whole spirit of the man seems to have undergone a change and his huge frame is convulsed in tears that seem to wash out and purify his soul. He seems a changed being, and soon the warden makes him a "trusty" and gives him the care of his garden and freedom of the prison grounds. While caring for the flowers he [illegible] the warden's little [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] and

THE MINISTER'S SPEECH. How the eloquent words of a statesman came nearly being destined solely for the ear of a hobby horse is laughingly depicted in this subject. The carefully prepared speech is rehearsed, and the manuscript, among other papers, set upon the table, where it attracts the attention of the minister's little son, who utilizes it into a cocked hat for his hobby horse. The minister, in evening dress, gathers up his papers hurriedly, jumps into his automobile and arrives into the Chamber of Deputies, where he is received as the guest of honor. He makes a few introductory remarks, meanwhile rummaging around for his speech. To his horror, it is not there, and he rises precipitately, rushes home in his auto, and after a frantic search finds the treasured manuscript bedecking the hobby horse. He then goes to the hall, delivers the speech and covers himself with glory.

CONSCIENCE OF A CHILD.—A prowler, entering a handsome residence, is looking about for portable booty, when he discovers a little girl asleep on a divan. Quietly he purloins money and jewelry. The child awakes, and while surprised at seeing the man, is unafraid; and her little heart touched by the haggard appearance of the intruder, she brings forth bread and wine, which the poor unfortunate, driven into wrongdoing through privation rather than desire, hungrily stows away. While he is eating and drinking the child is overcome by sleep, and, touched by her innocence and purity, the man gently lays her on the divan, kisses her, and replacing the articles he had intended stealing, exits, resolved to lead a better life.

DAN, THE ARIZONA SCOUT.—Dan, a typical Western scout, handsome and dashing, loved an Indian princess who reciprocated his affection. He is horrified to behold her in the distance endeavoring to rebuff the too ardent suit of an enamored chief. In backing away she falls over the cliff. Plunging the spurs into his horse's flanks, Dan dashes madly to the scene, and finds her huddled in a moaning heap. Tenderly he ministers to her, places her on his steed and leads her away to her camp, where she recites to her father, brothers and assembled braves the incidents that have befallen. Dan is welcomed, and the Indians resume their interrupted duties and sports. Later Dan and his sweetheart are enjoying a ride together when her disappointed suitor at the head of a hostile band attacks him. A terrific struggle ensues, but Dan is overpowered and left unconscious while the princess is carried away. When Dan comes to his senses he starts in pursuit, and under cover of the night overpowers her guardian, mounts her on his horse in front of him and gallops away, hotly pursued by the Indians. An exciting chase follows and as the lovers seem to be doomed to capture the princess' warriors are met and the tables turned. Dan marries his sweetheart, and the Indians indulge in a joyous dance.

THE NIGHT RUSTLERS.—A Chinese cook spies upon two rustlers, who discover and bind him to a tree by the roadside. The horse of the night herder is then stolen and the entire herd of cattle rustled away. The herder awakes and starts in pursuit on foot. Nearly dying of thirst, he falls unconscious within a few feet of water. The rancher's daughter finds the Chinaman the next morning and releases him; the alarm is given, the cowboys start in pursuit, accompanied by the girl, who is in love with the night herder, and a brilliant display of horsemanship is given. The night herder is found and the girl stops and revives him while the boys sweep down upon the rustlers, who are captured and turned over to the sheriff. The last scene shows the herder and the girl sitting on the bars of the corral, where he is shyly making love. Her father and mother come on the scene and the latter is shocked, but her husband pantomimically persuades her to leave the lovers in peace.

AMBROSIO

THE FISHERMAN'S CRIME.—John Burk, a former sea captain, has dissipated his savings and is forced to become a fisherman. A debtor calls and notifies him that he shall force the sale of Burk's cottage unless the debt is paid. Burk notes that the man carries a heavy purse, and plans to secure it. The man must cross the river on the ferry, and Burk runs ahead, invites the ferryman into a saloon and plies him with liquor till he is intoxicated. Disguising himself, he takes the place of the ferryman, and when the debtor arrives he is unsuspicious. Midway across the stream he attacks his passenger, robs him and throws him overboard. To divert suspicion he places the empty wallet at the side of the ferryman, who is slumbering on the bank. The latter is arrested and the circumstantial evidence against him indicates his conviction, when Burk, in a fit of remorse, confesses to the police.

TWEEDLE DUM'S FORGED BANKNOTE.—Tweedle Dum succumbs to the great temptation of a banknote of large denomination and steals it from the hand of a man who is holding it loosely. After ordering a lordly feast he is informed by the waiter, who is a detective, that the note is counterfeit. In a panic he escapes and flies down the street, where in his frantic haste he encounters all kinds of amusing mishaps. The face of the gallus detective is always appearing before him, and he is almost distracted when he comes upon a boy who is distributing the banknotes, which are printing but clever advertisements. He falls into the wash and in the melee both are badly punished.

CHAMPION.

HIS INDIAN BRIDE. Harvey Kingston falls in love with and marries a beautiful Indian girl, despite the bitter opposition of his family, bringing her to his home in New York. His proud and angry mother plans a mock reception. She invites all her friends and prepares them with knives, hatchets forks and other kitchen implements and at the entrance of the young couple, gives the signal, and they all begin a war dance about the astonished and trembling groom and bride. The father, bowed by the cruelty of the situation and the wonderful beauty and innate refinement of his Indian daughter-in-law, intervenes in his wife's malicious result and orders the guests from the house. He then acknowledges the union of his son and the Indian girl and compels his wife and daughter to do likewise. Because of the bitterness of his mother and sister toward his wife, Kingston furnishes an establishment of his own and duly installs his young bride therein. His family visits him at times, and the Indian girl often visits her father-in-law. The worth of the Indian girl is made apparent from the first, and when she jeopardizes her own unsullied reputation to save that of her husband's sister, whom she discovers in an intrigue, she keeps the secret even when, led by circumstances, the husband suspects her. Again when she telegraphs her brother to bring on sufficient money to New York to save the elder Kingston from financial ruin, she is once more suspected by her husband; and still she will not speak. She also forbids the father to tell. She yearns for a love that trusts. Urged on by his mother and sister, he openly accuses his faithful young wife, and she, without a word of accusation against him, nor of vindication for herself, goes back with her brother to her Indian home. Conscience smitten, his sister confesses her part in the intrigue, and even his mother relents, and they all assist him eagerly when he prepares to go after his wife. A good wife will always open her arms to a penitent husband, especially when that husband kneels before her and kisses the hem of her skirt. That is what Harvey Kingston did, and so would you and any honest man do the same. And his Indian bride took him back.

NESTOR

THE BLAZED TRAIL.—Again he had been refused, and this time George Martins knew it was final. If only Nellie could have trusted him—the cowboy felt sure it would make another man of him, that he could turn over a new page, so even Nellie Arnold would be proud of him.

These gloomy thoughts gave him no excuse for beating his horse, at least so thought the girl's brother, Frank, who at once took the disappointed suitor to task. The result was a quarrel, which might have ended rather seriously for George had Nellie not interfered and sent her brother about his business, while the cowboy rode away, and thence out of the State.

A year passed. Nellie in the meantime had married Jack Saunders and gone with him to his father's ranch, not far from where George Martins had settled. George follows Saunders from a bank and stealing from the house a large sum of money rides rapidly away.

It was this very speed that attracted the attention of Nellie as she rode up to find her husband's parents in wild consternation at the theft. A bag of oats, however, gave her an idea. Her pony, she felt sure, would be able to keep the stranger in sight, and by blazing each turn of the road with oats, the boys could easily follow, capture the thief and get back her husband's money—so, snatching up the oats, she darted after him. Ere the third turn in the road was reached, however, George had observed that he was being followed. Dismounting behind the bushes, he held his gun in readiness for his pursuer; but, as she dashed up, he was dumfounded to behold his old sweetheart. Quickly Nellie told him of her marriage to Jack Saunders, and implored him for his own sake to give her the money, so she might save him from the posse by blazing his way back to the ranch. Humbly and gratefully he complied with her request and hastened off in the opposite direction, while Nellie, true to her promise, led the boys back to their starting point, where, by showing her husband the recovered money, she prevailed upon him to abandon further pursuit.

ECLAIR.

THE LOST CHANCE.—The hero of this farcical story is a convict whom we first see as he laboriously creeps into the mattress of his hard cell bed. Shortly afterwards two wardens enter and not noticing the presence of the prisoner, hang the mattress across the window sill to air. It slips out, and falls on several other mattresses. The wardens rush out, but too late to seize the prisoner, who adroitly slips out of their way through the fanlight of a baker's shop, into a [illegible] though. It happens that at this moment the Mayor [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] of the cell, and [illegible] a [illegible] the [illegible] with [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Every once in a while, somebody or something makes a hit. That's the time we hear congratulations. THE CHAMPION FILM CO. has had considerable congratulatory comment lately, because we have made several hits that were almost crashes. Our batting average is 1000.

have succeeded but for the interference of his companion fisherman. But sad to relate the devil protects his own, for when Wall forces the cur to prove his statement or have his worthless carcass fed to the fishes, he allows full play to his imagination and tells Wall a story that would arouse jealousy in the most calm of men. How our eyes deceive us circumstantial evidence has made thousands of innocent appear guilty, and so it was when John following the advice of his false friend, spies upon his wife and finds her in the arms of the man he rescued from a watery grave. Broken hearted, Wall drives his wife and her supposed lover from his home.

His wife being seen in the arms of the yachtsman was due to her meeting with an accident. A misstep wrenched her ankle and in falling she was caught in the arms of the yachtsman. Generations of Puritanical blood flowed in the veins of this unreasoning husband, and the letters of explanation sent him by the misjudged wife were destroyed unopened.

With the spirit that martyrs are made of, this suffering wife never lost courage, strong in the knowledge of her innocence she continued to write to her husband in the hopes that eventually justice would be done her. Refusing the help of the man who had innocently been instrumental in her separation from all she held dear, she supported herself by her needle and led a blameless life.

The mills of the gods grind slow but sure and justice will not be denied—for the mother makes a final appeal and sends it to the daughter, who must now be old enough to understand and able to influence her father. That no time is lost in begging the wife and mother to return and that she received the welcome request with gratification and thanks to God is a foregone conclusion.

ATLAS.

THE SNORER. New York hotels are not noted for their modest rates and the action of the guests of the one our snorer selected for his abode, in bodily ejecting him for disturbing their slumber, was surely excusable and warranted in view of the facts. A turkish bath was his next place for attack—he got his bath, and to use a popular expression of the day, he got the goat of his fellow bathers

But how is a stranger to know that the public parks are used as a resting place for our guardians of the peace and that their meditations must not be disturbed under penalty of the law. Lawbreakers must suffer the consequences of their misdeeds and Snorer was promptly arrested for disturbing the peace. But innocence is mighty and right will prevail and after a short incarceration Snorer was promptly discharged—the entire reserves in the station house participating, assisted by the captain and lieutenant. If any one of them missed getting a good punch or kick in on our Snorer, it was purely an oversight. Some kindly and well meaning citizen not knowing the enormity of Snorer's past offenses, assisted him to the hospital. There his cuts and bruises were ably dressed and treated and as rest is an important factor in the recovery of one's health, the Snorer was introduced to the comforts of a nice sleep-compelling bed, much to his gratification. Mistakes will happen and the doctor had diagnosed his case incorrectly. His trouble lay in his respiratory organs—and this was not that kind of a hospital, therefore Mr. Snorer was firmly if not gently forced to seek proper treatment. So interested were the inmates in his case that each and every one of them assisted in his departure. In fact, several were so thoughtful they volunteered the use of their crutches—which they were obliged to throw after the late patient. Snorer's haste being great. We are told there is no rest on this earth for the weary. Snorer after his many recent experiences quite agreed with the statement. However, every cloud has a silver lining and A Snorer bethought himself of that ancient and comforting motto, "Requiestant in peace," and a happy thought occurred to him. Where do we all at last find rest? Why in the cemetery of course, and thereto our exhausted hero hied himself, but the departed ones arose in their wrath and drove the interloper from their rightful domain.

THANHOUSER COMPANY.

AN ASSISTED ELOPEMENT.—Glade and Sears are next door neighbors, and old friends. Glade has a daughter, while Sears has a son. The young people have never met, being away at school while the old folks have been cementing their friendship. As the two men own adjoining places, they believe that the best thing for the younger people to do is to get married. So they try to bring this about.

Gladys Glade and Charlie Sears meet on the train while they are returning home and start a flirtation. Perhaps they would have married in the end, if the old folks had not "butted in." As it is, they lose all interest in each other

Then the fathers try another tack. They decide to be bitter enemies in public, hoping that opposition will bring the children together. The new plan works like a charm, and Gladys and Charlie, realizing their parents' shortcomings, decide to elope. They do so, much to the satisfaction of Glade and Sears

A FRESH START. Jim, an expert chauffeur, is discharged from a garage, for insobriety. Penniless and being unable to obtain a new situation, he takes to the road, a common tramp. At one house where he applies for food, he is harshly refused and is about to turn away and try his luck elsewhere, when little Marie, the daughter of the house comes to his assistance and orders the butler to at once give him the food he requires. She also picks a rose for him from the garden

Jim strolls into a nearby park and sits on a bench to enjoy his lunch. He is about to take a drink from the ever present flask, which he takes from his pocket, when the sight of the rose, which the sweet faced little girl gave him, inspires him with a desire to reform. He throws the flask from him, and refreshed by the lunch, he starts out with a new ambition to face the world.

Little Marie also visits the park with her parents. While viewing the wonderful Zoo it contains she is seen and recognized by Jim. While admiring the little girl and viewing her enjoyment over the wonders of the Zoo, Jim notices that two evil looking men are apparently shadowing the little one and her parents. Jim's suspicions are aroused, and he determines to watch closely the actions of the mysterious pair. He finds that they have arranged with a chauffeur to assist in carrying off little Marie and holding her for a ransom. Seizing an opportune moment, Jim forces the plotting chauffeur to turn over his auto, and disguised in the other man's coat, cap and goggles, he calmly awaits the conspirators.

When the two wicked men return, after having successfully enticed Marie away from her parents, they give the driver of their auto directions as to where to drive. Jim simply nods assent and drives quickly off, but instead of taking them to the destination they directed, he lands them safe at the police station, where they are quickly taken into custody. Here Marie is united to her parents, whom she easily persuades to offer her rescuer a life position.

THE MATINEE IDOL.—After searching unsuccessfully all morning, George Tremaine, an actor out of employment, falls asleep on a park bench. He is rescued from the clutches of a policeman by Mrs. Durand, a wealthy society woman, who moved by his destitute appearance gives him money. Ten years later Tremaine has become highly successful in his art and is a matinee idol and a courted pet of society. Helen Durand, a beautiful stage struck amateur actress, becomes madly infatuated with him and writes him a letter, begging him to make an appointment. She also encloses her photograph. Tremaine, struck by the beauty of her face, invites her to call, promising that if she shows talent to give her a chance. Helen arrives and in a very amusing scene attempts to act. Tremaine's valet announces some gentlemen callers and Tremaine, not wishing the girl to meet any men while in his place, tells her to hide behind a screen until the men leave. Among the callers is Walter Hawley, the fiance of Helen. The men have several drinks when one discovers the girl behind the screen. Before Tremaine can interfere the screen is pulled aside, but luckily Helen turns her back and Hawley does not recognize her.

Tremaine denounces the men for their impertinence and requests them to leave the room and they do so. Helen comes out frightened and ashamed and is about to leave when Hawley returns to apologize for the actions of his friends. He sees Helen and is about to fight when she explains that it is her fault alone. Hawley takes Helen home and tells her parents of her folly. Mr. Durand grabs his cane and prepares to go to give Tremaine a thrashing. His wife follows and enters Tremaine's room in time to prevent a fight between her husband and the actor. Tremaine recognizes in Mrs. Durand the kind lady who years previous had saved him from hunger and arrest. He expresses his regret and promises that he will cure the girl of her infatuation for him. The next evening Mrs. Durand gives a dinner to which Tremaine is invited. After dinner he pretends to be very drunk and acts in a disgraceful Edith a note, signing the name of her brother, who is out of town, telling her that he has returned in trouble, and for her to send at once all the money she has to a deserted house on a lonely country road.

He comes to her home in advance of the note to see how his scheme works. Edith is in great distress on reading the note and phones for a messenger. Dick is sent to answer her call. She gives him the money to take to the directed spot.

Little Nell, on passing Edith's home selling her daily papers, sees Livingston hurrying away in his auto, suspects something is wrong, and climbing on the back of the auto rides away. Dick is speeding along the country road when he is overtaken by Livingston in his auto. The auto collides with the messenger boy and Dick is thrown to the ground unconscious. Nell still clinging to the auto. Livingston takes the money from the messenger, puts it in his overcoat pocket, placing the coat on the rear seat of his auto, and as he speeds away little Nell jumps from the car, taking Livingston's coat with her. Dick revives and Nell gives him the money. They return to Edith's home with it. Dick and Nell by this time have fallen in love with each other, and five years later show them coming from the little church around the corner happily married.

YOU SAVED MY LIFE.—An actor in action that is not all acting is rather a remarkable sight, and when he loves both on the stage and off simultaneously, and when he is observed making love to the make-believe sweetheart on the stage, by the real, sure enough sweetheart who does not understand that love making in a play is only play, and very far removed from the sacred course of true devotion, there is quite a healthy complication. A young leading actor saves a youth's life, by catching him just in time to save him from what might reasonably be a fatal fall over a precipice, and to reward him the young man promises to intercede with the father of the girl who causes the actor chap sundry heart throbs and a little soul-anguish. But all good intentions do not materialize—and the young man fails in his ambassadorial mission. The Summer comes on, and to fill in the time the actor decides to apply for a position in a moving picture studio. While he is making the eternal vow to a girl in the scene, he is detected by his sweetheart, and is renounced forever. In still another scene, his friend whose life he had saved discovers him tied to a tree, soon to be burned to death. He borrows a shotgun and starts to shoot everybody to save his friend from what purports to be a horrible death. After the excitment subsides, the actor explains that he is simply posing for the pictures. Things commence to go right again, as things do when they tire of going wrong. It appears that the father's refusal to consent to his daughter's marriage is based on the fact that the girl has an older and ugly sister, who is unable to secure a lover or a husband; so as a reward for having saved his life, the young man offers to marry the sister, so that the actor can marry "the sister's" sister. The wedding bells send forth a double peal, and four that are but two face this crazy old world for better or for worse, 'till death do them part.

A SISTER'S SACRIFICE.—The old tale of youth to youth, the answer of young blood to young blood's call, however often re-enacted, is ever fresh and appealing. Gay, silver-toned, light-headed and light-footed youth was never meant to mate with hoary senility, and never does as long as the right of the things of men prevail. One who has seen the Spring and the Summer and even part of the Autumn, the blear harbinger of the dismal Winter fast approaching—fade and join the mighty caravan of the dead months that make the past, one who has long quaffed the world's bowl of transient joy and its accompanying sorrow loves a young girl, and loving her reveals the sad irony of things, as of old. Her brother is in financial difficulties, and agrees to repay a large sum of money within a few days. Just at this time the old man's son arrives home from a journey, and at their first meeting falls in love with the maid in the manner of one strong with the pulse and throb of life, and the lust of Spring. The old man goes away on a vacation, but he has previously made a proposal to the girl whereby her brother's prospects may be redeemed. The girl comes to the old man's house to accept the proposal, providing he gives her ten thousand dollars to pay her brother's debts. The son receives the girl and the message, and decides to fulfill his father's promise. Suddenly the brother discovers that his sister is about to sacrifice her life for his sake, and determines to stop the marriage. Upon his arrival the sister tells him she is not sacrificing her life, but really loves—the young man—and the ceremony takes place, and the old truism that youth shall be given to youth is once more borne out.

LUX FILMS.

A SELFISH MAN'S LESSON.—How Thomas Arnold was cured of his great selfishness by a dream is dramatically told in this film. After refusing aid to his nephew, who is in distress, the latter's wife and child needing food and clothing, he enjoys a sumptuous dinner and falls asleep to dream that he himself is in poverty and realizes the pangs of hunger, etc. Awakening to find that it is only a dream, he determines to make amends and goes to offer hospitality to those who are in distress.

AUNT TABITHA'S MONKEY.—Aunt and her pet monkey, Toto, are rudely awakened from their hitherto peaceful existence by unruly neighbors whose noises are too much for the weak nerves of the monk. Complaints to the housekeeper are without avail and only serve to rouse the ire of the young people who are responsible for the trouble. For a "lark" these mischievous youngsters resolve to dislodge the monkey from his high estate and place one of their number in the room to impersonate the ape. The amusing incidents that follow are irresistibly funny and are well worth seeing.

GREAT NORTHERN.

THE LITTLE DRUMMER BOY.—A little drummer boy wandering from camp gets into the hands of the enemy. He is asked where Napoleon's army is located, but proudly answers that a French soldier is never a traitor. The commander, admiring the boy's pluck, questions him no further. The boy tries to escape, but is caught and brought back again. He hears the officers discussing a plan of attack, and rushes across the camp to a trumpeter, who is sleeping. Seizing a bugle he blows an alarm, which prepares Napoleon's troops for the attack. The little drummer boy, however, is shot. He sees his Emperor, salutes him and falls dead. Bareheaded, Napoleon stoops over the boy and with his own hands places a medal for the highest award of bravery on the breast of the brave boy.

DEFENDER

GREAT MARSHALL JEWEL CASE.—Crime cannot be imbedded so deep in the nature or heart that kindness and a helping hand cannot eradicate it. No obstacle, though it be as huge as Olympia, can be a bar to the onward battle for a better life, if the aspiration is inspired by love. So it is with until she is as proficient as her teacher; a willing [illegible] surrounded from childhood with vice and crime; taught the finer arts of the underworld tool of her father, who is one of the greatest criminals of his time, until kindness and love awaken the good that has never had a chance to develop in her nature. She battles with the inherent tendency toward evil, becomes master of her mind and turns from a life of crime forever. An act of kindness shown her has changed the whole nature of the girl, and she casts to the wind the training of her childhood. Dick Starr, Ruth's father, reading in the daily paper that Broker Marshall will exhibit the family jewels, his wedding gift to his handsome bride-to-be, exclaims in the most assuring tones that the jewels will be his by morning. He immediately plans the robbery, in which Ruth, against her will, must play the most prominent part. Under protest and threat, she is led to the Marshall mansion at midnight by her father and his confederate, and forced to enter through a porch window, and rob the safe. The jewels are there; Ruth brings them out for inspection, and their brilliancy so dazzles her that the peril of the situation is completely forgotten. Broker Marshall, having been disturbed in slumber by the noise downstairs, enters to find Ruth still in bewilderment at the fascinating jewels. Seizing the revolver Ruth had laid on the table, Marshall surprises her and goes to the 'phone to inform the police, but hesitates, and on second thought decides to pardon Ruth and offer her the opportunity to reform. She kneels, kisses his hand, and begs forgiveness. Leaving the mansion, she meets her father (Dick Starr) and his accomplice waiting for the jewels. The disappointment so wraughts her father that in his anger he commands the girl to be gone forever. The accomplice pleads in the girl's behalf, and is answered by a punch that fells him. Things happen fast. It is discovered that the jewels were stolen even after Ruth was detected. It develops that the theft was committed by Marshall's prospective brother-in-law, who had first seen the gems at the family exhibition. The bride-to-be, when informed that the jewels are gone, breaks the engagement, and Marshall, dejected and morose as a result of the unhappy trend of events, goes away for a while. The months join the dead past and a year speeds by. Then one day Marshall, searching for food and drink after a strenuous ride on the trail in a wild part of the country, stops at a shanty and once again sees Ruth, and his aching heart goes out to her. Their griefs and woes are forgotten in their mutual love, and a great peace steals into their hearts.

THAT LETTER FROM TEDDY.—Women have often deceived men, and letters have often deceived them. But sometimes a note will deceive a man into believing that his spouse is deceiving him, and then, of course, the last act is an apology—on his part. A young benedict, upon leaving home in the morning, observes a messenger boy hand a note to his wife, and his thoughts at once become troubled. Upon a pretext of having forgotten something, he returns to the house, and while his wife is searching for the missing article, he peruses the note, which purports to come from a lover, telling that he will be there that morning, and signed, "Lovingly, Teddy." After that he [illegible] intention of going [illegible] and [illegible] to the house adjacent to the [illegible] meet [illegible] with a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

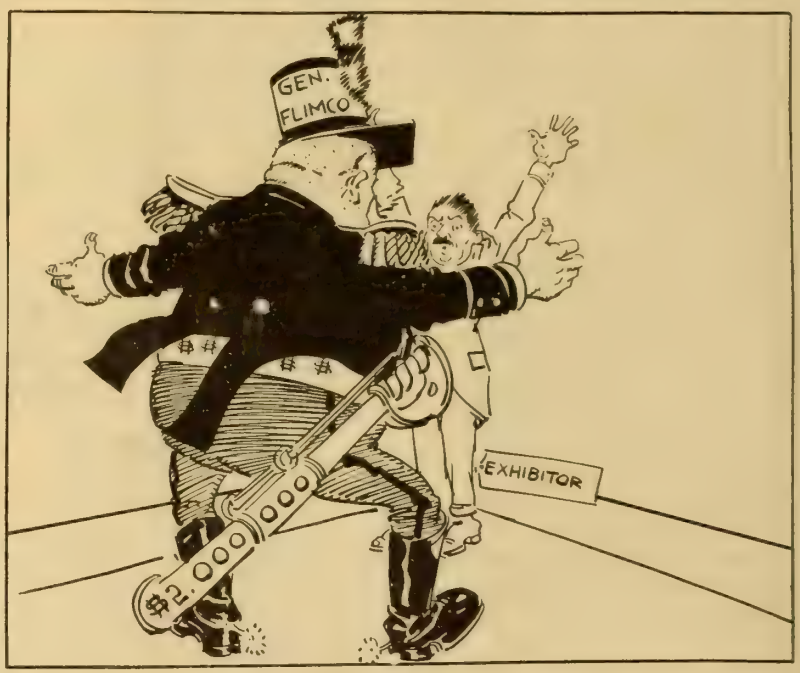
Don't Let Him Corner You!



I'm not publishing these cartoons to amuse you. I'm trying to show you, by pictures, what some of you won't take the trouble to read in words. I tell you your future is threatened, and badly threatened. What makes you so self-satisfied? What makes you think Gen. Flimco won't gobble up your theatre? If he can gobble up big exchanges and turn the former exchange-owners into knee-bending, servile, boot-licking hired help, why can't he grab your theatre, put in his own cashier and make you split receipts "fifty and fifty." If you have paid $104 in advance for a year's royalty, it would be better to kiss that money good-bye right now and turn independent rather than continue to make it easy for the trust to rule your roost. Don't wait till you are cornered. Don't expect the independents to rush to your assistance if you don't show some desire to help yourself NOW WHILE YOU'VE GOT THE CHANCE! For the love of safety, wake up! ! !

PERFECT ORGANIZATION

THE LARGEST FILM RENTAL BUREAU IN THE WORLD

Patent Mirror Screen
MOTION PHOTOGRAPHY

The most wonderful innovation in the amusement producing world is Motion Photography, however it has gone through many hard struggles before reaching that state of preeminent perfection. It has been the cry of the audience. "Yes the picture is good, but I am compelled to strain my eyes to see it," or "The theatre is so dark when the pictures are on that I cannot see to find a seat. or "The details are not brought out plain enough," or "If a person could see the expression of the face in the picture, it would unfold the story better," that all of these very vital defects were not conductive to comfort and pleasure one should expect when seeking entertainment at a place of amusement.

Many cities have taken up this question.. How can the Picture theatres be better lighted; it is not good for the moral conditions to have our younger people in a place that is pitch dark during a performance.

ALL OF THE ABOVE HAS BEEN ANSWERED! The eyes are not strained, but instead are rested The theatre is not dark—one can see a vacant seat on the farther side of the house. The details are so vividly stereoscopic that one can hardly realize that it is a picture, it looks so real. One can readily follow the story, as the expression of the face, the movement of the lips, the light of the eye, in fact one is looking at living, breathing, expressive reproductions taken from life and reproduced just as life is itself.

A True Indian Brave

Imbibing too freely, two cowboys boisterously force their attentions upon a pretty Indian maid. Her vigorous resentment arouses anger and the interference of her redskin sweetheart results in a conflict in which the cowboys are badly worsted. Their companions, innocent of the cause, pursue the lovers and are about to deal harshly with them when the sobered and crestfallen cowboys admit their fault and secure the release of the Indians.

Consolidation of Rental Interests.

Recent changes in the rental situation at St. Louis, Mo., have led to the formation of the Swanson-Crawford Film Company, of 200 North Seventh street, St. Louis. The new combination includes the St. Louis Film Company, the Western Film Exchange, the O. T. Crawford Film Company and the Wagner Film and Amusement Company, resulting in the formation of probably the largest Independent film rental company in the country. Thus, in this connection, Independent exhibitors may fully rely upon a service of exceptional size, influence and equipment. The company announces that they are buying from three to five prints of all the leading Independent brands of film on the market—eighteen in number. This puts them in the position of buying about eighty-five new reels weekly. The company also announces that it has 10,000 reels to start with.

The combination of the Swanson-Crawford-Western-Wagner exchanges is a master stroke of diplomacy and expediency and gives to the St. Louis exhibitor an exchange with more buying capacity and more available reels than any other in the country. The Missourian is credited with a "show me" prudence in regard to innovations, but after the decisive step towards concentration by the General Film Company it did not take long for diplomat Swanson to convince his business associates that combination and not competition was the life of business. Now the Missourian can "show us" a thing or two. St. Louis is reputed to be more of a picture center than any city of its size. It has many fine picture theaters that represent large investments. Now with a film service from only two large corporations competing on quality, St. Louis exhibitors can be assured of an adequate service and absolute freedom from conflicting programs. It is an ideal money-making condition for the exhibitor as well as the exchange and we understand that the exhibitors are highly satisfied with the conditions and the prospects.

This amalgamation of four great exchanges of the West is an event of considerable importance to the Independent side of the business, and should do a vast deal towards promoting the success of Independent pictures in St. Louis and the surrounding district. The company intend, we believe, to have an Eastern office in New York City. Meanwhile, we want to congratulate the moving spirits of the concern for the promptness with which they have faced a difficult situation. The rental side of the Independent business has naturally been weak for some time past, and now that it has been strengthened by the formation of the Swanson-Crawford Film Company, it should give films of reputable, high-class Independent manufacturers, a chance of finding their way into the hands of exhibitors, and thence to the inspection of the public.

There is only one more combination needed to more satisfactorily promote the picture possibilities in the South. That is a pooling of interests or corporation taking in the Morgan Exchange, of Kansas City; the Bijou Film and Amusement Company, of Kansas City; the Texas Film Exchange, Dallas, Texas; the Dixie Film Company, Louisiana; the Sunny South Film Exchange, Atlanta, Ga., and possibly the Cincinnati Film Exchange, Cincinnati, Ohio. As long ago as April, 1908, we predicted, nay advised a combination on the lines of the General Film Company as a solution of the film service problem. It really is a natural evolution of the business. We are now glad to see that the Independent forces are not averse to profiting from the example set by the business sagacity of their competitors and we again predict that as soon as other sections of the country note the benefits of combination or cooperation as exemplified in St. Louis and Boston, other centers of film distribution will follow suit.

A Neglected Branch of the Industry.

Professor William James died the other day. The Professor, like many other learned men of science, was interested in occultism. He believed, as many other men of science do, that the spirits of the departed revisit the glimses of the moon, and manifest themselves in some way or other to the living. Thousands of people all over the world believe the same thing, which is roughly the basis of what is known as spiritualism. "There is no death," says the well-known line; "what seems so is transition"—a very comfortable doctrine which we desire to treat with all reverence and respect. It is not for us in this place to discuss such a matter at any length.

Now, for very many years what is known as spiritualism has been intimately associated with photography; that is, photography of the stationary kind. For the last quarter of a century or more it has been sought to prove by the agency of the photographic plate that, unlike Mr. James J. Jeffries, the pugilist, people did "come back." That is to say, the spirits of the departed, assuming something like the kind of corporeal existence they had when they were living, came back to earth, and though not visible to the human eye, could be photographed through a photographic lens on to a sensitive plate. We have many of these alleged spirit photographs in our possession. Frankly, they are just clever fakes or frauds produced by double exposure or combination printing, or some other trick of the skilful photographer in league with the media to dupe the believer in spiritualism into thinking that he really has got a photograph of his dear departed in the spiritual form. This sort of thing is going on in New York City and other parts of the world at this very moment.

We do not want to pursue this matter at length, but as we perceive that there is a recrudescence of interest in spirit photography, we thought that some aspects of the matter suggested by the moving picture might illumine in these pages. Last year this time, we may remark, there was an outbreak of interest in New York City in spirit photography, and we had the opportunity, in another publication, of nailing down the fraud and the lie, for such it is. What we desire to ask is: What are the spirit photographers about that they are neglecting the moving picture in their business? The sensitive media on rollable celluloid is the same as on plates, namely, bromide of silver, therefore the spirit forms are just as capable of impressing themselves in a moving picture camera as on films or plates in an ordinary camera. Spirits, we know, or rather are told, float round about us. We have seen stationary photographs of alleged angel forms floating in the atmosphere. These would make very nice moving pictures. We must confess that in the stationary photographs of these spirits we have found field for much disappointment. They do not show the "life," the actuality, that we should like to see in the image of a spirit. They look very flat and unreal. But, consider now, what a great power the moving picture camera would be to the spirit photographer! He could show every movement of the dear creature, as he or it came into the room. There would be its entrance, its movements round the living being, for these spirits generally attach themselves to living persons. Then there would be all its movements in the presence of the living sitter. Finally, as the spirit takes its departure back to spirit land, its ghostly movements could be followed by the camera and the film. Realism! We should just think so! And then, when you make a positive and put it in your projector! How magnificent, how awe-inspiring to see on the screen a moving picture of these visitors from the other world—angels, children, dead-and-gone relatives, celebrities of the past hundreds of years—for the spiritualists claim that Napoleon, Julius Cæsar, John Knox, and most of the great figures of history come back to us—how wonderful it would be to see on the moving picture screen, in a five-cent theater, these truly wonderful films! Fancy by the aid of spiritualistic media working right here in New York City, to be able to put our relatives who have gone before us, and the great personages of history, on the moving picture screen. The mind reels at the prospect!

So let our spirit photographic friends get real busy. The ordinary spirit photograph, it is true, is believed in by many, yet there exists incredulity or skepticism in the minds of those who refuse to be misled by these alleged manifestations of false and spurious science. For we need hardly assure the reader that the pictures of spirits, so-called, coming back to us convince no level-headed and sensible person. If even there were such things as spirits round about us, it has not been demonstrated that bromide of silver is sufficiently sensitive as to be able to photograph them. In other words, spirit photography is a fraud and an imposture.

We are writing this article, of course, chiefly, as our French friends say, pour rire. Nevertheless, we have some serious object in putting these ideas on record. The spirit photographers, in fine, have overlooked the moving picture camera as an agency for carrying out their malpractices. We are not inciting them to take up this kind of work; we are only surprised they have not done so. For all that, as there is little in the current annals of moving picture or photographic work that escapes our observation, should it ever result that the spirit photograph ever appears in moving picture form, we should have something to say on the subject. Meanwhile, dear Professor James, why don't you redeem your promise and reappear to your sorrowing friends or send a message to them? A number of our spirit photographic friends who have gone, promised us that after they had left this vale of tears they would reappear to us in the form of psychic images on our plates or films. We have taken many hundreds of negatives since those promises were made and their promises are still unredeemed. Perhaps this is because we are too materialistic; not sufficiently sympathetic or sensitive; or not on a sufficiently high plane of what-do-you-call-it? We know not, reader. Do you?

The Worldless Play and the Silent Drama.

Second (and Concluding) Article.

By Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

In the Moving Picture World of August 13, we traced the historical connection between the wordless play and the silent drama. We pointed out that the first-named, which is a play performed by living people who do not speak, but depend upon action entirely for their interpretation of the plot, might be regarded as the precursor of the moving picture, which is a photograph of people enacting a wordless play. Clearly, then, the moving picture, to our minds, is the logical development of the wordless play.

Until recently the wordless play, or pantomime, has fallen somewhat into desuetude. The whirligig of time, however, has brought its revenges. The taste of the public for the silent drama, or moving picture, seems to have led to a revival of public interest in wordless plays. In other parlance, people having got so much habituated to silent moving pictures, have been prepared or educated up to receive with the greatest favor revivals of wordless plays performed by living people, such as were at one time popular.

When we last wrote, we drew attention to the fact that Mme. Pilar-Morin and her own specially trained company were to present the wordless play of L'Enfant Prodigue before the most fashionable audience in America at Bar Harbor, Maine. The play was duly produced accompanied by suitable music. It will interest our readers to know that it was a triumphant success. Fourteen curtain calls greeted Pilar-Morin. There were speeches, congratulations galore, and altogether the occasion was indeed a great one for the wordless play. It had "come back."

The "New York Times" last Sunday observed that "moving and talking pictures will never supplant opera and drama in its natural form. They may greatly increase the demand for musical and dramatic art by cultivating the taste of the multitude. That is something worth doing." That something has been done and is being done. We have all along contended that the moving picture was a tremendously educative force—educating the masses of the people up to the acceptance of, the insistence upon, and the understanding of, well-written, well-acted plays. The moving picture, in fact, has taught the public the value of action in the play, the value of a plot, the value of a clear story. We have not the smallest doubt that it was practically due to the educational effect of the moving picture that the Bar Harbor experiment of L'Enfant Prodigue was such a conspicuous success. Here you have a play in which there is not a word uttered. It is action, action, action all the time. Evidently the moving picture not merely improves the taste of the masses, but also that of the classes.

We said in our August 13 article that we should watch the result of this experiment at Bar Harbor with great interest. We are still in the same mood of interest and expectancy. On Friday, September 9, next, L'Enfant Prodigue is to be presented at the Liberty Theater, Forty-second street, New York City, by Pilar-Morin and the company which offered the play to the Bar Harbor audience. Thus the New York public will have an opportunity of studying the highest form of wordless play or silent drama acting. We should like to see a great attendance of moving picture people at this performance. We should like to see picture producers and moving picture actors and actresses present in great numbers. They will probably learn something from the presentation of a piece which has been in daily preparation for a period of over ten weeks, before it was offered to the public. We had an opportunity of seeing its final rehearsal. We had never before seen such highly artistic and finished acting; such perfect interpretations of an author's meaning; such an effective demonstration of "silent drama" acting.

The revival of L'Enfant Prodigue will assuredly give rise to the renascence of the wordless play. In our former article we enumerated several of these plays: the Pierrots; La Poupee; the great ballets such as we have at the New York Hippodrome. All these are wordless plays, in that complete reliance for getting the effect desired at "over the footlights" is placed upon action, and action only. The voice does not help the performer in the elucidation of the story and plot. It is all pure pantomime. If such a revival comes about its influence can clearly be traced to the work of Pilar-Morin and her well-trained and gifted associates. Frankly, we should like to see these wordless plays "catch on." For if they are popular we think they will have a favorable reflex action on the moving picture, inasmuch as manufacturers and producers will probably have to respond to a public desire for the very highest class of acting.

It cannot be pretended that in all cases the moving pictures that are issued in such large numbers from the manufactories depict the very best acting. Too often the "acting" is of an amateurish character. The wordless actor or actress is himself or herself placed right in front of the public and is therefore himself or herself instantly judged by his or her bad or good acting. In the moving picture, of course, you only have the actors' or actresses' photographs. For all that, the average moving picture audience is just as critical of the photographic performer as of the real one. They are as appreciative or as depreciative as occasion calls for. The public, in short, are unerring judges of acting. They know the good from the bad and seldom mistake the one for the other. In L'Enfant Prodigue, on September 9, the public will see some of the finest acting in the world. We hope the play will be filmed, so that it may stand as an object-lesson of what acting in a moving picture should be.

L'Enfant Prodigue is only a six-part play. Besides Pilar-Morin herself, Miss Nelly Grant, who is in the cast, is a well-known moving picture actress, and so is Mr. H. Scarborough. The two remaining characters are filled by a well-known actor and actress. There are three scenes in the play, which is supposed to be enacted in France, let us say a hundred or so years ago. We may regard it as a Gallic version of the Biblical story, "The Prodigal Son." In the French version Pierrot, Jr., quits his home for the sake of a girl who throws him over for a rich baron. Then the saddened boy returns home to be disowned by his parents. He, however, redeems himself in their eyes by enlisting in the French army. The curtain falls on a little scene showing the young soldier waving the French tricolor. This is the barest outline of the plot which is unfolded in three acts. Wormser's beautiful music accompanies each and every action and movement in the play.

A Biograph Pastoral.

Last week there was printed in our columns an article on the sentiment of the picture. We gave a definition of what sentiment is in regard to the subject. Sentiment, briefly described, is simply feeling. It was reasoned out that the successful maker of moving pictures must necessarily have the sentiment of the picture strongly developed. He must, in short, feel the picture. In other words, feeling, artistic, pictorial quality must distinguish his picture. From the sentiment of the picture to the pictorialism of the picture is only a short step. Indeed, we go so far as to say that sentiment and pictorialism are convertible terms: one thing means the other. Your picture maker, whether in stationary or moving picture photography, clearly feels the sentiment of the result shown in his work.

The more attentive of our readers know by this that we are always on the alert to exalt the pictorial aspect of the moving picture. In the MOVING PICTURE WORLD of June 25 we published an article headed "The Qualitative Picture: The Influence of the French School of Picture Making." This article, we are pleased to learn, attracted widespread attention, and has set many of the manufacturers, especially those new in the game, to considering what a moving picture is or should be, in contradistinction to the mere moving picture photograph.

The two things, as we have pointed out over and over again, are by no means identical. A photograph may be just a photograph: that is, a cartographical transcript of the original, or in simpler words, a mere map; or it may be a picture; that is to say, it complies with the definite laws of composition, balance, and all the rest of the elements that go to make up a picture of any kind. These are the elements that we desire to see in the moving picture. Fortunately, here and there, they are becoming increasingly perceptible.

In order to illustrate what we mean by pictorialism in the moving picture (if we may use a somewhat tautological term), we have chosen almost at random from a forthcoming Biograph release entitled "A Summer Idyl" a few enlargements from parts of the film. These are reproduced in this article. Here, it seems to us, as we look on these prints, that the photographer and his associates in the production of the work must have felt the sentiment of the picture. The result is that we have a series of very charming little rustic studies, quite naturalistic in effect, full of atmosphere and, above all things, of simplicity. There is, it will be perceived, a noticeable absence of staginess and theatricality. We who write this are not unfamiliar with farm life. Moreover, we have made many photographs of such subjects. Had we made the photographs illustrated in this Biograph release, then we should have felt that we had produced something pictorial.

The stage director is an important personage around any film manufacturing plant, but the day is not far distant when the art director will also collaborate in the production. The position may not—evidently does not—exist in the majority of instances; but it will have to be created and filled by competent men.

The Biograph Company is noted for its great attention to the selection of its subjects. Millions of people throughout the world have got to look upon the Biograph picture as in a class by itself. Its technique is uniformly good. These illustrations show the Biograph picture in a somewhat new aspect; that is to say, they are a departure from refined comedy a la mode which is associated with the company's reputation. Never, in our experience, is anything so restful to the eye in a moving picture house as a pictorial nature subject such as is illustrated on this page. Around us as we write this article are a number of photographs: portraits, groups, and the like. But upon one photograph in particular we never tire of gazing. We mean a simple plowing scene, and in this Biograph picture we have a similar theme pictorially treated. Such a subject in a moving picture theater always arrests attention. We remember how, last December, when the Kinemacolor subjects were shown at Madison Square Garden, the loudest applause was given for a scene from farm life. All this goes to prove that in making pictorial subjects from outdoor life the film makers have an almost inexhaustible stock to draw from and which never fail to please audiences.

It is not alone the artistic quality of the pictured scenes in this Biograph film that appeals to us. Besides being satisfying to the eye, they are instructive to the mind. The opportunity has been seized upon to represent the various duties of the up-to-date and prosperous farmer in a way that is refreshing and educational to the city dweller; and not only to the city man, but the pictures will convey new ideas to other less favored tillers of the soil. It might even be classed as an educational film.

The web of interest which connects the varying scenes in "A Summer Idyl" is a story so simple that it would hardly have appealed to the average producer. A city man of Bohemian proclivities is rejected by the coquettish woman of his choice. He hikes to the country to forget his sorrow and meets and falls in love with the daughter of a well-to-do farmer. To continue his wooing he seeks and obtains employment on the farm, and here the photographer shows us many interesting views of farm life, with Cupid in attendance. But the city girl relents and learning her lover's address sends him a coy note which brings him back to the city's whirl. And for the happiness of the plain country lass and her old granddad it was perhaps just as well.

"A SUMMER IDYL" Biograph

The unusual ending, with no broken hearts and no remorse, is rather a novelty in such pictured stories, but it seems all the more real in that it is just what we would think would be the most natural thing to happen. Which is another point in favor of this true to life picture of the emotions and occupations of mankind.

Cherry Kearton and His Work.

The World Famous Moving Picture Photographer of Animals Visits New York.

The last time we met Cherry Kearton, some nine years ago, was in the office of the renowned photographic optician, the late T. R. Dallmeyer, in London Dallmeyer, the prince of good fellows, and the then head of the old established optical house which bore. and still bears, his name, always took a strong personal interest in the special needs of scientific photographers At that time, Kearton, with his brother Richard, was reaping fame in the photography of natural history subjects. Rare birds, animals, insects, fishes and the like were the things he photographed. No difficulty was too great; no time too long; no position too ordinarily inaccessible for the intrepid Keartons. To swing down the face of a cliff with the angry waters tossing on the rocks hundreds of feet below, to point the camera at a bird in its nest, was quite an ordinary thing for these men to do. In fact, they are probably the most daring and intrepid photographers of the time. Both brothers are honored by the personal friendship of Colonel Roosevelt, who just before vacating the Presidential chair, invited Richard Kearton to the White House at Washington. Now, he is in friendly converse with Cherry Kearton, who at the moment is in this country on a short business visit. Colonel Roosevelt, as all the world knows, abhors the "nature fakir" and the photography of "nature fakes." The Keartons stand for pure unfaked photographs of natural history subjects All their work has been naturalistic, viz.: true to nature. That is why Colonel Roosevelt, good man, likes these men.

Then, Cherry Kearton was in Africa when Mr. Roosevelt was going through his memorable shooting experiences. He made many moving pictures of the Colonel and his adventures. These and others were shown in this country a few months ago. The transition of Cherry Kearton from stationary photography to moving picture photography was, of course, inevitable. And when we came across his name in this connection some time ago, we were glad. Here in this city we have a small collection of the Kearton's' natural history books, illustrated by their photographs. They make fascinating reading. But it was only the other day that we saw one of Kearton's moving pictures, although for the last few years he has been doing some splendid work with the moving picture camera in Africa and elsewhere. This picture was the pursuit and the slaughter of a lion by the Masai, an African tribe. Here you see the king of animals being hunted and speared to death. In the last scene of all he puts up a fight, but he is no match for the spear-armed savages. Kearton took this moving picture of the killing of a lion, when he was suffering from fever and had been foodless for several days.

The moving picture photographer in Africa runs just as much risk as a sportsman armed with a rifle. One lion bit a piece off the corner of Kearton's camera and then (fortunately) got away. Kearton has photographed most of the fauna of East Africa, including hippopotami and other fearful wild things. He was accompanied by a little fox terrier, who showed that he had no more fear of a lion than a cat has of a mouse. We are not going to spoil Kearton's story of his African wanderings. He has written a book, to which Colonel Roosevelt kindly supplies the introduction. The book purports to be written by the fox terrier. This is a novel idea and will probably succeed.

Mr. Kearton's immediate mission in this country is to supervise the preparation for exhibition of some African moving pictures which he did for Buffalo Jones recently. Later on, he is to go to India to make moving pictures of the fauna of that amazing land of adventure. These pictures will probably be seen on the moving picture screen in due course, probably through the agency of the Selig Polyscope Company.

The moving picture work which Kearton undertakes is not of the usual studio kind. He does not confine his efforts to the "peaceful State" of New Jersey, or to recording the movements of the bucking broncho from a respectable distance out in the West. He faces danger, lives among it and apparently thrives on it. Fever, hunger, discomfort, the slaughter of savage animals: these are the conditions under which Kearton does his work. But he is absolutely fearless. He graduated by taking photographs neck deep in water, or down the face of a precipitous cliff. All this was good training for moving picture work in the African jungles. Kearton survives all this so well that he will probably go on to the end of the chapter where danger lies. For once the "call of the East" gets hold of a man, he is lost to the charms of Broadway and the London Strand.

What would you think of a flashlight photograph of an active lion a few feet from you? This is one of the little performances which Kearton is proud of. We have seen the print. It was so good that we coveted the possession of one. We have it.

Cherry Kearton is quite young. He is forty, and looks thirty. He is full of enthusiasm for hazardous moving picture work. A specimen of the breezy, unaffected Englishman prepared to go anywhere and do anything if his heart is in the work. We wish him success in his future endeavors.

On his return from the West, Colonel Roosevelt is to make an inspection of Mr. Kearton's latest African films. These are to be shown, we believe, at a special function of the New York Press Club within the next few days.

An Esthetic Tragedy.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

Whoever selected the scenes of "Jepthah's Daughter" (Gaumont) has the esthetic faculty developed to an extraordinary degree.

The theme of the play is well known. The whole history of Jepthah is given in Judges xi.-xii. He was a judge and chieftain who went forth against the Ammonites vowing a burnt offering of whatever came forth from his house to meet him if he returned victorious, and the first to come was his only child. She bravely consents, and the vow is fulfilled. It is a very noble tragedy, large enough for grand opera, and it is handled in strict accordance with the philosophy of good taste. One scene after another of resplendent beauty is flashed upon the screen until it is filled to overflowing. There are so many, and they are so varied, gorgeous interiors, palaces, pavilions, streets, temples, exquisite lake vistas and flowering woodlands, that one deeply regrets the space limitations. It is an epicurean feast for anyone having a sense of the beautiful and it seemed to me that the crowning glory of the picture was the sombre scene shown where the victim of a father's hasty vow is being rowed back from the mountains where she has passed two months' respite in prayer. In the distance is the sable mountain lifting its head against the dying sunlight, typifying the situation—the light of this young life is about to be extinguished—and in the foreground is the slowly moving boat bringing the victim. One can see her fluttering robes of death as she occasionally appears, a powerful stimulus to the imagination.

I confess that these ancient religious rites arouse a feeling of repulsion, the fanatical belief in sacrificing the lives of innocents is morally symbolic without conveying a lesson. Another Jepthah has just won a great victory on the Cotton Exchange, cleaning up some ten millions of dollars in a short time. Within easy reach of his commiseration are thousands of suffering women and children, some of them dying from lack of food and fresh air. What percentage of his ten millions will they get? The high priests of the modern Jepthah are disheartening misfortune and withering want. The altars of human vanity still run red with the blood of innocents.

I am not very much in sympathy with these plays of other days, except when their historical value contains a living idea; we are too busy with our own problems. But, whenever a picture play has some great merit, I am only too glad to appreciate what well deserves praise.

Infinite pains were taken in setting this Gaumont tragedy, not only tremendous labor in presenting such a brilliant spectacle, but a quality of selective taste was shown that entitles it to high rank among such productions. So far as exquisite selective taste is concerned, the pictured story of Jepthah's daughter is in the front rank, the very first and foremost of the file. I cannot, at this moment, recall any that surpass it in scenic loveliness and strict adherence to the doctrine of taste. In that respect it may be pronounced a masterpiece.

Better than the immediate effect of such a production is the light it throws on the landscape of motion picture possibilities. Each one of the scenes is a thing of beauty, slightly marred by too much theatrical effect, too much strutting on the part of actors, too much bandy-legged super with the wooden spear, and this scenic beauty is in no place inappropriate. A particular spot seemed to have been chosen for the central action, for the grand painting, and the miniatures are all in agreement with it, each exactly suitable for its purpose. Therein lies the secret of success in setting a pictured play. The elusive quality of the mis en scene is harmony. The Gaumont tragedy has it, but most of our own lack it.

In referring to French acting, complaining of its artificiality, I am not directing my remarks to this particular play, but embrace nearly all I have seen. I have lived too long in France and associated too closely with French people not to know that Paris is the home of the dramatic art, and nearly every man, woman and child in the gay capital is a born actor. That is the trouble with them. Acting has become traditional, transmitted from age to age, regulated by accepted models, so conventional that Rostand was needed to shake the old edifice to its foundations and show his own people that they must keep pace with the times.

American motion picture actors are more inclined to independence. The French are natural actors, the Americans natural men and women.

A few of our actors in moving pictures have no equals in France. As to the actresses, the French women are remarkable for their elegance, for grace of movement, for sharp intensity and for exquisite taste in costuming.

The American women in the pictured scenes are superior in natural beauty, and—I am speaking of the best—have that delightful personality which reaches out into the hearts of spectators. The French women are charming. The American women are lovable.

The interiors as well as the exteriors of the Gaumont picture are beyond comparison with our own. That is the case with nearly all French interiors. I am not referring to actual interiors in French homes. You may roam the world and find none equal to those of Fifth avenue and Newport, and the American woman is a born decorator of her home. In these picture plays, the French give attention to minute details while our producers slam on a lot of stage furniture very unlike the real thing and neglect the little graces that give a room the restful spirit of home life.

The acting in this particular play is above the average. The roles of Jepthah and his daughter are well assigned. The former is played with great dignity and the latter with grace, feeling and delicate appreciation of the exacting role. There is little or no opportunity for the minor characters, but they are grouped in tremendous masses and with great skill.

"Jepthah's Daughter" is an important step in the evolution of the silent drama.

Variety and Originality.

By W. S. Beckwalter.

The qualities of variety and originality are essential to the continued success of the moving picture. Variety, it has been said, is the spice of life, and of course there cannot be any variety without originality. It cannot be said truthfully that the moving picture has of late been suffering from an excess of these desirable qualities. From more than one exhibitor comes the sad plaint that there is a sameness, a monotony in subjects, distinctly harmful to the moving picture in its aspiration to popular favor. With a profound appreciation of the splendid services which, almost without exception, the associated manufacturers have rendered to the moving picture, it must be admitted that the grievance of the exhibitor is not without foundation. Now that the moving picture, it is to be hoped, has finally parted company with its humbler companions of old, the penny arcade, the merry-go-round and the dance hall, and is finding its way into the favor of wider and better circles, more will be demanded of it than ever before, especially in the matter of variety and originality. From my own observations and from the experiences of exhibitors who have spoken to me on the subject, I am inclined to believe that the fault lies in equal division between the domestic and foreign film makers. I think we see altogether too much of the French policeman and his "brother-in-arms," the Paris cop. Now there is no doubt about it, the "gendarme" is everlastingly funny to the Frenchmen, and justly so. The subtle, volatile wit of Paris loves to laugh at anything or anybody with pretensions to seriousness. The "gendarme" has been the target of the French humorist, cartoonist and paragrapher for centuries. He abounds in comic opera, which, indeed, would scarcely be complete without its French edition of Foxy Quiller. This fine French wit, alas, has never been imported into this country, and I fear it could never live on our soil. The exhibitor who depends for his prosperity on the public cannot be expected to educate the American people to the height of this "funny policeman" business at his own expense, not, at any rate, with the film rentals now prevailing.

Another platitude which could be easily dispensed with is the cheap melodrama, and here our American film makers are more to blame than our Gallic friends. I am under no delusions in this respect. Cheap melodrama, to be sure, is as unassailable an institution as pie in Boston or scrapple in Philadelphia, but there are "temples of art" where this sort of thing is specialized to the furthest limit, where villains in fearful dress suits are handcuffed at the end of the last act and the hero squeezes the blushing bride to his arms. Why render this "take-back-your-gold" variety of the cheap drama into moving pictures? No one is disposed to deny that a great deal of virtue resides in factory girls, laundresses, blacksmiths, etc., etc., and the everlasting demonstration of it on the stage of the moving picture is apt to get tiresome.

The chase, the mother-in-law joke, the mischievous boy, "comedies" with displays of lingerie or bodily deformity as chief features are entitled to a vacation, which may begin at once and last forever. If the moving picture cannot outgrow all this stupidity, old and stale as it now is, it cannot hope to expand into wider and more ambitious fields. Of this kind the public will indeed get tired, but of the pictures that show variety and originality and do not assume that man is but a badly finished monkey the public will get tired only when human nature ceases to delight in the theater.

A splendid beginning has been made, the associated film makers being especially entitled to credit, though one or two of the independent concerns have also shown a tendency in the right direction. There should be no lagging or turning back.

Everybody in the moving picture industry knows which company turns out the most popular films to-day. And what is the cause of this success? The company has been bold and daring enough to crack the time-worn moulds labeled "drama" or "comedy" and to cast moulds of its own. It has given us men, women and children as they lived in the past or now live in the present, instead of a lot of old threadbare stage dummies. Any path but the old and trodden one is good. Originality is desirable at almost any price. Imitation is the bane of the industry, the annoyance of the exhibitor and the exchange, and, as the Irishman said, "the most successful imitation is the worst failure."

John Pelzer, the popular sales manager of the Edison Manufacturing Company, started out on a business trip on September 1 to cover the principal cities as far west as Omaha. His itinerary covers twenty cities and the exhibitors and exchanges therein will all receive a call from the Edison representative, who is one of the best posted men in the business.

LIBERTY.

Looking through the window of the room in which the writer sits penning his thoughts for readers of the Moving Picture World, he is compelled to behold Bartholdi's Statue of Liberty silhouetted against the sky by day, and bearing her beacon light torch by night. With this emblem ever before him, his readers in these pages need never fear that his writings will lack in "freedom's true ring." In the last issue of The World, Lux Graphicus asks for a definition of "Infallible." He asks a hard question. I wish, too, he might have asked the meaning of "Liberty." An answer thereto would make easier the purpose I have in view in expressing a few thoughts under this head.

It is often helpful to find out anything in a positive, by proving what it is not in a strong negative. Under this rule we learn that liberty is not license. There was a time when the "riff-raff" of certain parts of Europe, hearing that America was a "Free Country" governed by "Liberty" which in their blind ignorance they supposed to be license, hurried to the "Land of the Free" in droves; Anarchists, Nihilists, Black Hands and everything else; for in America could they not "do as you please"? For a time they made matters interesting in many countries and in many ways; at least one King in Europe and one President in America fell as victims to this misguided interpretation of "Liberty." The best positive definition of "Liberty" the writer knows, came to him in a very peculiar way. Two men were fighting when one accidentally hit an innocent passer-by on the nose; the latter retaliated by administering a severe punishment upon the fighter, who claimed immunity in this being a "free country." "Yes," replied the victim, "but I will have you know that 'the freedom of your fist ends where my nose begins.'"

Truth in a nutshell! Liberty is "our rights," and our rights cease where the next man's rights begin, and vice-versa; whereas license respects no man's rights. Here, if you please, Lux Graphicus, is one—yet incomplete—definition of "Infallible": The man who knows and practices true liberty is infallible.

But what has this to do with moving pictures? Simply this, that the careful use and observance of the true principles of liberty are those which in the majority of instances will solve many vexatious problems and answer many questions. We all know that even as "men rush where angels fear to tread" and as "undesirable citizens" rushed to these shores, so many "undesirables" rushed into the moving picture business and by their undue "License" wrought much evil. But true "Liberty" established herself in the moving picture business and they were thwarted; as a result there is a marked growth of development within and toleration without the realm of the moving picture profession and better results in every way are the daily experiences of both makers, exhibitors and the public.

Liberty promises contentment and enjoyment, with the cultivation of the highest virtues and the education of the people; where there is no liberty there is ignorance; where the light of liberty sheds her benign rays, there education and culture are the illuminating forces of light.

At the dedication of the above named famous statue the orator of the day said: "When Franklin drew the lightning from the clouds he little dreamed that in the evolution of science his discovery would illuminate the torch of 'Liberty' enlightening the world." This was only twenty-four years ago, and to-day in the further "evolution of science" we have that same light shining the liberty-giving knowledge daily to millions of people by its use when concentrated in moving picture power. We are aiming high; Liberty is our watchword and Liberty our inspiration, and when we have reached her zenith we shall be infallible.

NOTES FROM WASHINGTON, D. C.

A. J. Brylawski, who operates a chain of motion picture houses in Washington, is always doing something to place his theaters to the fore. His latest movement is the introduction of an organ accompaniment at the Colonial, which with the piano makes very beautiful music. He has succeeded in securing two of our best organists, so there is no lack of the artistic. These are Armand Gumprecht, formerly organist of St. Patrick's Church, and Edward Robinson, of Mount Vernon Church. This new departure in the line of music has been attracting additional crowds to the Colonial. Good and appropriate music is a strong point in Mr. Brylawski's management. He maintains at the Cosmos the largest orchestra to be found at any of the moving picture houses. This is under the direction of John B. Bovello, who gives artistic finish to the selections rendered as well as to the excerpts that accompany the various themes of a picture play. It was just the other day that Mr. Bovello made no less than twelve changes in the course of a motion drama, each strain fitting in beautifully with the emotions of the story. This harmonious effect has been the talk of the town.

The Lyman H. Howe travelogues at the Columbia Theater drew large crowds. "Roosevelt in Egypt" was one of the chief attractions of the program on Sunday night, especially now that the Colonel is creating such a stir in politics in our own country. "Paris Before and During the Flood" was especially interesting and depicted the French capital in peaceful and turbulent scenes. Mr. Howe has certainly a passion for water scenes and he is also aware of the fascination that such scenes have upon the audience, for he never loses an opportunity of throwing upon his screen, lakes, rivers, cascades, falls, and the ever-changing ocean. The swish and splash sounds which accompany these pictures make them most realistic.

A theater here that has solved the problem of lighting the house during the display of its pictures, without destroying the clearness of the pictures upon the screen, is the Plaza. By the use of subdued colors over the electric bulbs, the lights are kept burning all the time and there is no conflict with the light from the operating machine. The theater is therefore not thrown into the darkness practiced by most managers during the exhibition of pictures. The music at this theater also adds to its attractions. W. H.

THE EMIGRANT.

An Excellent Selig Comedy.

It would have gladdened Selig's heart if he had heard the uproarious applause awarded to this clever comedy in Keith's Theater. Usually the audiences at this house are most phlegmatic and rarely applaud the finest specimens of photography or acting. We often feel disappointed at this theater as the spectators seem so unappreciative. The story of "The Emigrant" starts out in a pathetic vein, relieved here and there by a touch of comedy; the development is adroitly worked out by sharp contrasts of comedy and pathos and the climax is a bit of brilliant comedy. We noticed several people sitting near us who laughed until the tears ran down their cheeks. As a sample of the kind of film that is in most demand we point to "The Emigrant" and congratulate the producer.

THE SIMPSON SOLAR SCREEN.

Seeing one of these screens in use for the first time this week at the Comet Theater, we were surprised at the effect. While the side and ceiling lights were brilliant enough to enable us to read a newspaper, the picture on the screen was perfectly clear. In fact, it seemed less tiresome to the eyes than where almost total darkness makes the work of the eye more arduous. The proprietor of the Comet was enthusiastic over his purchase and said that the screen was well worth the little extra cost. The agitation by the authorities in several cities to light up the theater will be easily complied with if a screen is installed that permits the house lights being turned on. At present we know of only two that will do this—the Mirror Screen, and Simpson's Solar Screen.

HAVE CAPTURED THE MASSES AND CLASSES.

After a very quiet Summer season the theaters are again taking on new life, and by the first of the coming week will all be open for business. This Summer has seen a rich harvest for the motion picture and vaudeville theaters, and although several new ones have recently opened all have done excellent business.

Motion pictures have captured the masses and also the classes. It is difficult to hire a man to work at any great distance from a picture theater for fear a new film will be put on and he will not see it. Vaudeville is a good second. In the meantime the legitimate suffers.

NEW EDISON TITLES.

Beginning with "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland," released September 9, and on each subsequent release, Edison films will be shown with an entirely new form of title. The main title and each sub-title will be enclosed in a simple but very characteristic frame so that an Edison film can be recognized at any stage of its showing. Criticism has been made in the past that because of their inconspicuous titles it was difficult for anyone not in the trade to distinguish an Edison picture. With the new style of title it will take the public but a very short time to become familiar with the design and thus always recognize the picture as an Edison.

The leaves are fast falling from the trees of Summer pastimes and they will soon present a stark and bare appearance. People are returning from the Summer resorts in larger number for such an early period than for many years. It has been an "off" season and amusement managers both at the seaside and in the mountains complain of unsatisfactory business. The moving picture people, who are looked upon as the most striking human thermometers of success and failure, are among the most sincere mourners. All agree that the weather has been responsible for the conditions. There has been but little real Summer and when there was a likely looking period the heat was so intense that the people would not think of going into buildings or under tents to see pictures. Rainy days have also been numerous and such weather in the country is a hard knock to the pictures. In the cities rainy and stormy weather frequently prove a benefit to the picture theaters, especially in cases of sudden storms and where nickelodeons have quite a transient patronage. The people will run into the places for shelter and consider the nickel or dime left at the box office, money well spent, as they keep dry and find pleasing entertainment while waiting for the storm to blow over. Not so in the Summer resorts. When dark clouds are hovering the people cling to the shelter of their homes and the hotels, and the picture houses do not figure as sheltering places as in the cities. Taking the country as a whole there were less moving picture places by from 30 to 40 per cent. at the Summer resorts this season than there were a year ago and there was almost a similar percentage of more places in the cities that kept open throughout the season than were open last Summer. This is attributed to many reasons, notably that the Summer was late in opening, that the weather in the city was, with but few exceptions, quite mild, and many owners of houses had their places fitted up since last year for Summer business.

Re-openings of the city picture houses have been quite brisk during the past week, particularly in New York City. The number of new places is large and the approaching Fall will show a surprising increase in picture houses over the list of any preceding year. It is also noticeable that many theatrical men who either entirely, or in part, control or conduct regular show houses are opening picture theaters to be conducted entirely independent of their other holdings.

Much interest is evinced in the outcome of the approaching season. Some predict that vaudeville will be more prominently than ever identified with the picture houses. Others contend that, aside from the large theaters that have turned to the picture field but have retained a sufficient amount of vaudeville to relieve the monotony, as they call it, vaudeville will be more limited than last season. The performers, however, are looking forward to a good season. Many agencies are now in existence which make a specialty of gathering vaudeville talent for moving picture houses and their managers are responsible for the glowing hopes entertained by the people who do the vaudeville turns. We will soon see who has best defined the situation. After the first Monday of September New York City will have almost its full quota of amusement places in operation.

Here is a letter I received this week:

"Man-About-Town: To settle a discussion will you kindly express your opinion as to whether the General Films Company, which is absorbing the licensed film exchanges, is doing so because the number of exhibitors is growing less and a plan of gradual consolidation has been framed to meet the conditions?"

After receiving this letter I went out on a tour of investigation in quarters where the kind of information required to answer the correspondent could be found. I cannot see that the conditions spoken of exist. There has really been no decrease in the number of exhibitors. I do not know that there has been made public by the General Films Company a declaration of its policies. Nearly all of what has been said or published regarding them has in the main sprung from conjecture and such is the case at the present time. It is no easy matter to form an idea of what the company referred to intends doing by what it has done, nor can anything of a prospective nature be gleaned to aid in forming the idea. I feel confident in stating this: Consolidation does not seem to be the objective point at this time. All the acquired exchanges in Philadelphia and in New York City, with one exception, are still doing business at the old stands. I have in mind two places where consolidations were effected (in Rochester and Chicago), and from what I can learn in connection with them the conditions existing in the respective exchanges forced consolidation. By this I mean that a struggle in competition was going on and the revenues were not near what they should be on the capital invested and the time and labor spent; and I am reliably informed the change was welcomed by all the exchanges concerned.

It has been pointed out that the General Films Company clearly showed its hand in St. Louis, where two exchanges went out of existence and a third one was created to take their places. Many are laboring under a mistaken idea of the St. Louis situation because they think the licensed exchange now in existence there is controlled by the General Films Company. How this false idea took root is quite plain. The present exchange is owned by the Yale people, the same company that operates an exchange in Kansas City, Mo. That exchange is now controlled by the General Films Company. The St. Louis exchange is not and its operation is entirely independent of the Kansas City place. The facts as I have been able to glean them are that the Motion Picture Patents Company cancelled the licenses of two exchanges in St. Louis, charging violation of rules under the contracts. This left the city without a licensed exchange and immediately afterward the Yale Company applied for and was granted a license. It is therefore clear that the two former exchanges were not absorbed and had no successor, the Yale exchange being an entirely new venture, and as the General Films Company does not own it, or control it, the matter really has no bearing in support of the consolidation discussion.

I will agree with many others that the handwriting on the wall indicates a gradual consolidation of exchanges in many quarters, but I am convinced that some time must elapse before it can be accomplished. Anyone acquainted with the film exchange business knows the task involved in properly conducting a film exchange having considerable business and the gigantic task involved in merging with that business the operations of one or more other exchanges. It may be an easy matter to consolidate exchanges, but the great task is in systemizing, regulating and properly conducting the affairs after the consolidation has been effected. It is not a matter of days or weeks, but months—and many of them.

One of the most popular film exchange managers in the East was J. A. Willis. Some time ago he managed the Kleine Optical exchange in New Orleans, La., and when George Kleine sold out that exchange Mr. Willis was transferred to New York City, where he managed Mr. Kleine's exchange there. I visited that place a few days ago and expected to see the usual beaming countenance of Mr. Willis and get a grasp from his ever welcoming hand, but I was doomed to disappointment. I found the gentleman had again pulled up stakes and departed. This time he struck out for the West. He has gone to Cincinnati, Ohio, to manage an exchange there controlled by the General Films Company. I am informed that the change is in the nature of a personal advancement for the worthy gentleman. I take this occasion to express the hope that it is. Mr. Willis is an indefatigable worker, sincere and conscientious, and has the happy faculty of making friendships quickly and retaining them. His position in the New York exchange is now occupied by Mr. Hancock, Mr. Willis' former assistant. He is a young man of much promise and is said to be managing the exchange with flattering success.

Well, here is to the opening of the Fall and Winter season, that it may be fully as successful as it promises to be, and at its close may the croakers who are continually bemoaning the wane of the moving pictures be so effectually squelched by the results that they will welcome oblivion and stay there.

"THE CONSPIRACY OF PONTIAC" Kalem

This impressive picture shows Chief Pontiac inciting the other chiefs and warriors to revolt. They plan an attack on the city of Detroit under cover of a flag of truce. But their treacherous plot is revealed to the commander of the fort by an Indian girl whom he had befriended. The Indians attempt the massacre, but are surprised and defeated. The Kalem people have taken the synopsis of this spectacular play from Francis Parkman's "History of the Indian Wars"; therefore the film is an important addition to the historical and educational usefulness of the picture. It will be issued on September 23rd, and we believe it to be the finest and most spectacular Indian subject the Kalem people have yet produced.

THE COMET AND THE SOLAR SCREEN.

As a relief from the combination programs in the Fourteenth street houses I entered one evening the Comet, an all-picture show, on Third avenue, near Twelfth street. Inspection of the front prepared me for some, but not all, of the varying emotions experienced within—but of that later. The Comet draws its patronage from the East Side tenement district. When I entered it, it was filled with men, women and children, and I had to wait my turn for a seat. Meanwhile I observed many attractive features. The aisles are wide, and the seats comfortable. An exit corridor is partitioned off from the auditorium which allows patrons to depart without interfering with the vision of others. The ventilating system is excellent, and although the house was crowded, the atmosphere was agreeable. This was further purified by an obliging usher who meandered up and down the aisles spraying them with some sweet scented liquid. Most noticeable was the amount of diffused light throughout the auditorium. Seated about the middle of the hall I found that I could comfortably read a page of the "Moving Picture World." Yet, with all this illumination, the picture on the screen was brilliant. The brilliancy was due to the fact that a Simpson Solar Screen was in use. Now this Solar Screen seems to us to have one great drawback: its brightness reveals the blemishes of junk films to a most alarming extent—for this is what was running as we took our seat. It was a Vitagraph picture. I knew this because of the Eagle trademark. This was followed by a Selig similarly identified. But, talk about your junk! They must have been at least two years old, and so scratched and patched that it was hardly possible to tell what the picture was about. Surely the exchange that furnishes such miserable junk to any exhibitor deserves the severest censure. There is no excuse whatever for the toleration of such example of greed and carelessness. The two junk films were followed by a Powers picture play: "Her Private Secretary." This was about a week old and photographically showed up well on the screen. The story was clean and well acted and received the applause of the audience, as also did an Itala comedy which followed. Then came another junk reel, and we sought out the manager to learn that the service was two Independent reels of a week old and three commercials. Now the proprietor would be money in pocket if he would discard those commercial reels and substitute a third reel, if he must have it, of Independent film.

"Backward, turn backward, oh, Time in your flight; make me a child again, just for to-night!" If I had as many dollars in my pocket as times that this refrain of an old-time ballad runs through my head in the course of my moving picture experiences, I should be a wealthy man, I should, with a swell automobile and an aeroplane. I would invite all my friends to a corking good dinner at the Cafe Martin, Broadway and Madison Square—my favorite eating place in little old New York, when I am not broke. But, as I am mostly broke, me for the Cafe Des Enfants: Child's, to wit! I saw the other day that the President of the United States told the world what he would do if he had an income of $5,000,000 a year. Well, I told you what I would do if I had a similar sum. Without exaggeration I would have that annual income if each of my aspirations to be a child again were represented by one dollar.

The desire to be young again was never so strong upon me as the other day when I sat and watched an old friend of mine on the screen: Robinson Crusoe. Lor' bless me! How my mind went back to the days when I sat in my little attic at home following Mr. Crusoe's adventures on the desert island. What an impression that book made on me; what an impression it has made upon the minds of many millions of other children. I would give something to revert to the frame of mind when the printed book has all the charm of romance; when the unreal is real, when right always triumphs over might, vice is vanquished, virtue victorious, beauty rewards the brave and everybody lives happily ever afterwards!

"Life is sweet," it is said, "at two and twenty." It may not be sweet at twelve; but it is trusting; it is trustful; it is all credulous. Why, there is hardly a man Jack of us who at twelve did not believe that Robinson Crusoe actually met with the adventures which Defoe describes. Millions of children are believing the same thing this moment. Let them go on believing. It is well to have a few illusions, preferably in life's early stages. Mine began to disappear somewhere in the early twenties, when the same Robinson Crusoe was transferred to the British stage. What I saw was not a bit like the book. Robinson was generally an opulent young woman in pink fleshings, and Friday was the funny man. The stern verisimilitude of the story has never been treated on the British stage. Poor Robinson was generally a pantomime or a burlesque hero. So away went all the illusions of boyhood.

I was disappointed in one omission from the Great Northern film. This was the well-known scene in the book where Robinson comes across some mysterious footprints in the sands. These he subsequently identifies, if I remember aright, as belonging to the man Friday. In the pantomimes, operas, etc., that have been built around the story of Robinson, this was always made a great feature. Never mind, the picture will surely please the children all over the country. When you do that, as I have pointed out before, you are making the staunchest possible adherents of the moving picture theater. And now, by a forced association of ideas, comes Buffalo Bill, another idol of youth to be perpetuated, I hope, on the moving picture screen.

Oh! Blow it! Twenty-four years have passed since I saw Colonel Cody and his troupe in London. Life was sweet, then, at two and twenty! The Colonel was the rage of London. And after this long span of years, I find him still the rage of America, beloved by young and old, especially the young. I am pleased to learn that the Colonel and his troupe have been filmed by my friend Craft. Three reels of the Buffalo Bill-Pawnee Bill Wild West shows, with Indians, cowboys, cowgirls, Mexicans, Cossacks and hundreds of horsemen in their great riding exhibitions, are to be shown on the moving picture screen. State rights for these films are available and I hope they will be taken up all over the country for a long time to come.

Subjects such as these are of perennial interest, especially to the young. We read much of the pernicious influence of the dime novel. After all, the dime novel is not half so bad as it is represented to be. It ventilates a love of daring and adventure in the minds of the young. Were it not that boys' minds are fed with a love of adventure by books, there would be very little real adventure in the world. The profession of the sea is largely recruited by means of books, and I can quite imagine that a study of these Buffalo Bill pictures will implant a love of adventure, horsemanship and the like in many a youthful mind. So that, strictly as recruiting agencies for a love of outdoor life, of the horse and of personal bravery, the influence of these pictures is not to be despised.

Colonel Cody has certainly had a great career. I was interested in reading in "The Billboard" an authentic account of it by Frank Winch, who is in a position to tell the world the truth about the adventurous Colonel's life. The Colonel is a fine figure of a man and is by way of being something of a universal hero, with nothing derogatory to his name. There is not a boy in the land who does not know of him by reputation. There is probably not a boy in the land who would not be delighted to see the pictures of him and his troupe on the moving picture screen. I hope every boy will.

So, as I have said, I wish I were a boy again so that I could enter into the spirit of these pictures with all a boy's zest. For the boy is not troubled with any considerations of probability, verisimilitude, truthfulness or the like. His young mind is not confused or perplexed by doubts as to whether the thing written or shown really happened or did not happen. To him Colonel Cody is an immortal hero, and he is not allowed to associate the Colonel's name with sordid matters of commercialism, age, retirement, State rights and the like. Happy boy, happy in your simplicity, enthusiasm and ignorance! Long live Robinson Crusoe! Long live Colonel Cody! "Backward, turn backward, oh, Time in your flight; make me a child again, just for to-night!"

WILL MAKE MOVING PICTURES OF BRAIN.

"We are to take moving pictures of the brain at work. This will be the next step in scientific development, and it will mean mercy and proper treatment for so-called criminals and justice for self-willed criminals. To the normal man it will bring more than any prophecy, for it will determine his capacity for education and will show him the boundary at which he should stop.

"Soon we will be able to know the histology of the brain and modify it by a standard which may be easily established. Then we need have no more foot-free fools or supereducated car conductors."

This is a statement made by Dr. Max Baff, psychologist, of Clark University, Worcester, Mass.

The discovery of this great solution of the problem of crime, education and matrimony is due to experiments that have just been concluded by a body of earnest investigators, who have combined the Roentgen ray, or X-ray, with the cinematograph and have found they can take moving pictures of the internal organs of the living human body.

Will Test Criminals.

"We shall be able to decide with the addition of enlarged moving pictures of the brain, whether or not the miserable person squirming in a cell on a charge of murder is really fit to be freed on the ground of irresponsibility," declares Dr. Baff. "If we have the X-ray and the tamillamicroscopia, which my friends in Buenos Ayres are perfecting, we shall be able to codify the histology of the mind.

"In other words, once we have known the movements of the brain when the cells are magnified 5,000 times, we shall know something of how and why certain offspring of certain couples are imbecile, while certain couples of similar cases produce children of worth."

"The Modern Prodigal" (Biograph).—A modern application of the old story of the prodigal son, representing a young man of these times going to the city, there to fall a victim to its alluring snares. Escaping in prison garb, he seeks his home, and, like the prodigal of old, eats ravenously the husks which are thrown to the swine. He saves the sheriff's child from drowning, but the sheriff does his duty and arrests him. However, the sheriff's wife, yielding to her maternal instincts, allows him to escape and return to his own mother. For dramatic reasons, perhaps, it is well not to quarrel with the author for putting the onus of the young man's downfall upon the city. It had to be placed somewhere, yet is hardly fair to thus again brand the city as a region of crime and a home of criminals.

"The Stronger Sex" (Lubin).—Whether this film is intended to call attention to the disparity in wages paid men and women for the same work, or whether it is intended as a criticism upon the way men manage their business, does not appear from the film itself. But it does both very effectively. There are some dramatic incidents, notably the one where the sex of the stenographer is disclosed. But aside from these points the picture does not rise above the usual Lubin quality.

"Memento of the Past" (Pathe).—The most striking feature in this picture is the facial expressions which betoken such malignity and hate on the part of both husband and wife. The story of disagreement is not new; and the fact that a child's toy brings them together again has been many times repeated; but the acting here is unusual, and the control of the facial expressions is remarkable. Then comes the relaxation, the return to sanity and the sweeping away of the past and its bitterness. It can all be read in the two faces and is as graphic as it would be if the spoken words could be heard.

"Kids Will Be Kids" (Pathe).—Yes, kids will be kids, and perhaps the operator has reproduced a scene which is common in more than one home, or will be before long. Not all children perform such marvels of acrobatic agility, but they probably do leave their tasks as soon as authority is removed.

"The Emigrant" (Selig).—While not all emigrants receive the treatment accorded the hero of this tale, undoubtedly some do, and perhaps this film will exert an influence in their behalf which will be beneficial to all alike. The scenes in the steerage are well worth seeing, and the method of sending them across the continent will be recognized as accurate by those who have seen it done many times. For those in the country, away from the big centers where these emigrants congregate, this picture will be a revelation. Perhaps they have never realized the actual cruelties to which these emigrants are subjected many times. If not, here is a faithful transcript of the story. The heart interest, supplied by the benevolent Irishwoman and her son, who act as Good Samaritans, helps hold the attention. It is a film well worth while.

"The Deputy's Love" (Essanay).—Not all men are so smitten with the pretty girls they find performing criminal acts that they manage to evade making arrests. In this instance the deputy runs his quarry to earth, and when he discovers that the girl he loves is implicated in a stage hold-up he arrests her and takes her away along with her brother. If these pictures exert any effect, such as has been charged, an ending of this sort will correct. There is no encouragement to commit crime when it ends with the criminals apprehended and on the way to prison. It takes nothing from the interest of the picture to do this and the influence upon the audience is better. If those who might commit a crime that promised immunity can be taught that they are likely to be caught and punished the picture will have a salutary effect.

"The Vow; or, Jephthah's Daughter" (Gaumont).—A representation of the old Bible story of Jephthah's daughter.

Different individuals will have different ideas regarding the adequacy of the pictures here presented; yet, it seems but fair to say that they are of more than average merit and present a reasonably accurate and full interpretation. At any rate, the story is plain from the pictures. Whether the costuming and action are accurate are matters which can be determined only by long study of the records of the life of that day. Sometimes experts disagree on these points, hence it is practically impossible for laymen to decide. So far as is commonly understood, however, this picture seems to present the story of an incident in the history of ancient Israel with sufficient accuracy to make it understood. The mechanical work has been done with care and the picture promises to be more than ordinarily popular. In the amount of elaborate work done upon it, and in ambitious purpose it clearly ranks as the best film of the week.

"In the Pyrenees" (Gaumont).—A satisfactory reproduction of scenery in some of the most picturesque portions of these picturesque mountains. Like most of the Gaumont outdoor work this has been done with intelligence and discretion, with an artist's perceptions fully exercised in the selection of viewpoints. When well done, mountain scenery makes an attractive picture, and the success of this one is evidence of the appreciation of the audience.

"The Castaway's Return" (Pathe).—A picturesque story of a lapse of memory and how it was brought back to a mariner who had been long shipwrecked on a barren island. The re-setting of the home as it was when he left it brings about the desired result. Many changes have been rung upon this lapse of memory; and this one is no better nor worse than the ones which have preceded.

"How Jack Won His Bride" (Pathe).—A reproduction of humorous scenes arising from the discovery of a serum that changes white people to black. It works successfully when administered to a rival and the objecting parents and the lovers seize this obvious advantage to marry.

"Rose Leaves" (Vitagraph).—A pretty story of rose petals and their influence upon a girl's life. In babyhood, in young womanhood, when temptations beset, the shower of rose petals is used with good effect. She not only breaks away from evil companions because of a shower of rose petals, but it changes a young man's life. There is a gentle pathos about the picture which appeals strongly to one's emotions, and as the scenes succeed each other similar occurrences come before one and add interest to the film. It is one of those simple domestic pictures, representing the triumph of virtue in a difficult situation. Such pictures always please, and this, acted with the ability usually displayed by the Vitagraph players, is rather better than the common lot.

"The Valet's Vindication" (Edison).—Not every valet who undertook to redeem his wasted fortunes by renting his employer's apartment would escape as easily as this one. But perhaps not every valet would be an unwitting agent of Cupid in opening a love match. While the picture hasn't much in it beyond a little entertainment and a certain degree of humor developed through unexpected situations, it is, after all, reasonably satisfactory. The staging and photography are both in harmony with the subject and are well done. The closing scene, with the valet forgiven and installed as a sort of guardian angel over the new home, is a species of mild climax to an entertaining film.

"The Lovers' Well" (Pathe).—A pretty love story, involving a young soldier, a pretty girl and a Hallowe'en charm of looking in a well to see a lover's face. There is almost an estrangement, but happily it is averted and the young couple are apparently in a fair way to be happy ever after.

"The Canadian Moonshiners" (Kalem).—Perhaps this title is slightly misleading, since moonshining, as it exists in the South, is unknown in Canada. What this really refers to is the sale of whiskey illegally. The title explains it sufficiently, however, for all practical purposes. The main feature is this sale and its effects upon the Indians. The mounted police are well presented and the typical Canadian scenery is faithfully reproduced. The picture presents a story full of spirit and the mechanical work is well done—so well, that one has practically no criticism to offer regarding it. The picture presents a reasonably accurate impression of the country and some phases of its life, even though it may be presented in a somewhat melodramatic manner.

"The Men Haters' Club" (Vitagraph).—A lively bit of comedy representing a party of girls who attempt to go camping without a man. All sorts of difficulties beset them, from spiders to tramps, and they are at length quite willing to cease their men-hating proclivities and permit the boys to help them out. And here Cupid comes into his own again as the different couples plainly enough indicate. It must have been in the air, for the angular old maid is approached by a farmer, and they, too, kindle anew the flickering spark of love. The discomfiture of the girls when troubles come is amusing and the inference to be drawn from the picture is very consoling to mere men.

"The Shepherd and the Maid" (Gaumont).—A love story which has considerable gloom, since the lovers, made so through an accident, are shortly after separated and for forty years do not see each other. If love be true, so long a separation must have caused pain to both. The story contains no particular point, and beyond the fact that they were true to each other it possesses little interest.

"Ancient Castles of Austria" (Gaumont).—A film of picturesque reproductions of these beautiful ruins. In most instances scarcely anything beyond a mere semblance remains; but they enrich the landscape and add to its attractions, partly by their beauty and partly by their association with a storied past.

"Jean and the Calico Doll" (Vitagraph).—A dog story which has much interest, as all such stories do. The intelligence of animals makes a good picture at any time, and when it is utilized in rescuing life, as this one is, the interest is measurably increased. Apart from the virtual rescue of the injured child by the dog the film contains no striking characteristics. The misplaced money, the false accusation and the child wandering away to find her brother are all interesting features, but they are in reality but incidents upon which to base the intelligence of the dog.

"You Stole My Purse" (Essanay).—A lively comedy, with plenty of snap and go to it, the usual characteristics of the Essanay house. It is short, a good fault, since it is often impossible to spread a comedy over a long film and keep it up to the standard. Short and snappy pictures like this are better, and success is predicted for this particular film.

"Who's Who" (Essanay).—A short comedy, filled with all the life and animation which usually characterize the Essanay work. It is always important to discover "Who's Who," and here the whole thing is depicted so graphically and in such a funny way that one may not choose but pay attention.

"The Game with Fame" (Kalem).—A picture which may set many thinking. It is so easy when fortune favors and success seems assured to forget the homely, old-fashioned associates of one's younger days. But frequently when misfortunes overtake one it is the old loves, after all, that are true, and the old hearts to whom one may turn in trouble. And this picture, which depicts an episode of that type, details this fact in human experience dramatically enough to make it seem real. It is easy to play a game with fame, and lose, as this girl lost; but not all who lose are fortunate enough to have the old friends to whom they can turn for comfort. A picture like this sets one thinking, since it is based upon facts that are intimately connected with the ilves of practically all people.

"Advertising for a Wife" (Pathe).—A comedy based upon the supposition that a wealthy young man advertised for a wife. The miscellaneous collection of women who answered the advertisement would have done credit to a curiosity shop. But he got rid of them by a ruse that worked successfully, and finally selected his maid.

"Buying a Bear" (Urban).—A humorous story, telling how some young fellows, locked up for some offense, buy a bear and change costumes with some showmen to escape from their predicament. If the bear had not drank too much and begun to cut high jinks himself, all would have gone well. But he got into trouble and was trundled away to the station house in a barrow. The film is entertaining, but is not especially strong.

"A Cruise in the Mediterranean" (Urban).—An outdoor picture which will rank with the excellent ones Urban has produced heretofore. A cruise in the Mediterranean is well worth while and when one is brought to one's fireside, almost, it is all the better. Like all the work of the Urban producers in outdoor photography, this film is remarkably attractive, and one obtains a reasonably accurate idea of what the historic Mediterranean is like. The mechanical work has been done with exceptional care and the reproduction is remarkable for its fidelity to the original.

INDEPENDENT.

"Fantastic Furniture" (Lelair).—A humorous skit depicting the adventures of a young couple upon returning home from dinner to find their furniture bewitched. Not until it begins to walk away do they realize that it is necessary to undertake to prevent it, and then begins a chase which results disastrously for those unfortunate enough to be in the way.

"The Widow" (Imp).—Not all widows are like the one here shown, but unquestionably men have always suffered somewhat at widows' hands. The vigorous drubbing which comes to these two suitors is rough, but funny, and their luckless plight when the woman hurshes with them is sufficient to excite the risibilities of almost anyone. In other words, like the pilot who undertakes to investigate the mysteries of buzz saw operation, these two gay sprouts get what is coming to them, and depart, vowing vengeance upon the fair instigator of their discomfiture.

"Who Killed John Dare?" (Yankee).—An excellent illustration of the possibilities for error which exist in circumstantial evidence. Three men were suspected of this crime but after careful work it was conclusively shown that he was killed by a peculiar accident. Any one of the three might have been condemned for the murder, but fortunately detective work of no mean order prevented such a consummation. The picture has a peculiar interest, due to these features, and the story is stronger as it advances until the denouement, which furnishes a fitting close to a somewhat notable film.

"Foolshead in the Lion's Cage" (Itala).—Here is Foolshead in a new situation. He is seen in a lion's cage, and the complications which arise are humorous enough and thrilling enough to satisfy the most exacting. Foolshead is productive of much sport, and in this situation he develops some new funny stunts. The lions are apparently more surprised than Foolshead.

"Kit Carson" (Bison).—Whether this is intended to represent an actual scene in the life of Kit Carson does not appear clearly; but at any rate a picturesquely attired scout performs superhuman deeds in saving a party of settlers from an attack by Indians. All the features of the old-time frontier story are present. The surrounding band of whooping redskins, showering arrows into the stockade; the settlers' wives and children loading the guns for the men, and the scout all alone riding at a terrific pace for help; and the arrival of the reinforcements in time to save the settlers from annihilation. It is thrilling and contains sufficient excitement for half a dozen pictures. Few films representing Western scenes have been so filled with the stirring scenes which are popularly supposed to have occurred there.

"The Latch Key" (Thanhouser).—A little domestic mix-up which supplies entertainment without taxing one's mental capacity to assimilate. The best part of it is the chagrin of the stenographer when she discovers her appalling mistake. The story ends there without a suspicion of anybody falling in love with anybody else, a restraint which will be duly appreciated.

"Dan, the Arizona Scout" (Bison).—An Indian story with a slightly changed setting. It is no worse than the others, and better than some. There is some furious riding and when the Indian bands meet, a hot fight. But the novelty of this type of picture is wearing off. No more in the case of the Bison product than others. Indian pictures are interesting chiefly because of the novelty they develop. But this type is no longer novel. Pictures which graphically represent actual life scenes and customs are still as popular as ever; but stealing women, furious riding and sanguinary conflicts are practically the same always. It is time that a change was introduced in this class of pictures.

"The Burlesque Queen" (Powers).—A comedy intended for light amusement during the hot season and it amply performs its purpose. The picture is admirably done and is sufficiently funny to justify its existence.

"The Horseshoer's Girl" (Powers).—Another hot weather comedy, having no other purpose than the amusement of the audience. It presents no troublesome social question, and offers no suggestion for the correction of abuses. It is comedy, and comedy only.

"An Assisted Elopement" (Thanhouser).—Possibly more than one elopement has been similarly assisted. At any rate, as soon as the young folks felt opposition they decided to elope, much to the satisfaction of the elders in the game. The picture is high-class comedy and the acting is so true to life that no great stretch of the imagination is required to make the personages seem real.

"A Society Sinner" (Great Northern).—Adapted from Bernstein's well-known story, "The Thief." The subject is one of merit, and the actors are all prominent in their profession. The result is a picture certain to please. It is better than the long list of almost meaningless films which have been put out during the past few years. It tells a good story, and tells it admirably, a necessary qualification for a successful film.

"Fabian's Hollow Tooth" (Great Northern).—A comedy in which this famous comedian appears to unusually good advantage. The action on the screen appears almost too realistic for comfort. It is too reminiscent for those who may have suffered similarly in the past.

"The Fisherman's Crime" (Ambrosio).—A much too clear and detailed picture of a robbery and murder, and the means taken to fasten the crime upon an innocent man. There is altogether too much reason for the many criticisms of motion pictures in this respect. While a majority of people would understand that this is only a picture, like a story; but others see it acted so graphically and seem to think it is the reproduction of something that actually occurred. There are enough tragedies and enough dramatic subjects without reproducing petty murders and robberies of this type, which may exert an injurious influence upon weak minds.

"Tweedle Dum's Forged Bank Note" (Ambrosio).—A rough-house comedy, representing the mad and destructive career of a man who attempts to pass a bank note of large denomination, but is informed it is counterfeit. He upsets everything in his path and creates a general disturbance before he overcomes his fright.

"The Cowboy and the Easterner" (Champion).—A comedy calculated to magnify the bravery of a cowboy at the expense of an Eastern man. The story is a variation of the love stories in which Eastern girls and cowboys are interested, worked out with some change in details. The cowboy in this instance saves the girl from a fake bear, from which the Eastern man incontinently flees, and after that, of course, his chances disappear quite as rapidly as he did himself. Yes, the story serves to while away a few minutes, but it offers nothing further. There is no display of heroism. It has no tense dramatic climax. It is merely a pleasant story, offering a bit of diversion, without including anything approaching instruction or dramatic interest.

"The Blazed Trail" (Nestor).—A cowboy story of a blazed trail that led to and away from a thief. One dislikes to criticise films upon which producers have spent time and money. But the output of cowboy pictures has become too large. They are made to represent any sort of scene, relying upon the picturesque features of cowboy life to carry the picture, no matter how weak the story may be. While no fault can be found with this picture as a picture, the fact remains that it is one of many. Film after film is released, with cowboys as the principal attraction and no strength or dramatic purpose to the story. Producers should exert themselves in other directions and obtain scenarios that have some claim to interest aside from a sombrero hat and a horse that can run.

ROBINSON CRUSOE.

A COMING GREAT NORTHERN HEADLINER.

When we saw some weeks ago that the Great Northern Company were about to release a picture on the subject of "Robinson Crusoe," we made a mental note to go and specially see it before it was issued. We were curious to see what a company of Danish actors working in Denmark would make of Defoe's immortal story. Daniel Defoe, an English writer, we would tell the reader, was the author of "Robinson Crusoe," familiar more or less to children all over the world. The story of the lonely castaway, who meets with so many adventures on his desert island, is variously dealt with in the entertainment world of Great Britain. Infallibly at Christmas time it figures in the form of a pantomime at probably a dozen theaters throughout the country. It has formed the subject of comic opera, burlesque, songs—you may regard it, in fact, as a kind of "Rip Van Winkle," which has also been turned into play, opera, burlesque, etc.

There must be wonderfully enterprising and conscientious producers out in Denmark, for as we sat and watched this film, we were amazed at its verisimilitude. Denmark is not a tropical country, and yet when Robinson Crusoe arrived on his desert isle, there were all the indications and appearances of tropicals, vegetation and the like. This splendid film follows the story very closely. The lad leaves home, goes to sea, is shipwrecked, cast upon an island, builds himself a home and apparels himself in accordance with the book, tames his little colony of animals (such nice animals, too), falls in with Friday, disperses a horrible band of cannibals, befriends some pearl fishers, and finally is shipped home safe and sound, in company with his faithful Friday, to the arms of his old father. On the island Robinson wears the traditional garb of the many stage Robinsons we have seen, the cannibals are very savage, ugly persons, and the whole story is worked out, it seems to us, with such great conviction and probableness that we have no doubt that the Great Northern "Robinson Crusoe" will be popular with myriads of young people throughout this country and with many oldsters like ourselves. At the opening of the Fall season, we desire specially to commend the Great Northern Company for the timeliness of this release. It should boost up their business enormously.

On the same occasion when we inspected "Robinson Crusoe," we were vastly interested also in a Great Northern film called "Danish Cavalry." This is a film showing the exercises of three or four hundred Danish cavalrymen mounted on some superb horses. These horses were put through all sorts of exciting movements, culminating in some ocean antics in which both men and beasts had to swim. Aside of its military aspects the element of danger was not absent from this film, which was of beautiful photographic quality, showing, by the way, some of the best rapid movement work that we have seen in a moving picture. The picture, in fact, reminded us very much of the famous Italian cavalry subject. We only regret that this Great Northern subject was not much longer, for it was such a superb study of smart soldiers and fine horses showing off their best points in difficult drills. We are confident that wherever this film is shown it will create the liveliest interest and be exceedingly popular. We congratulate the Great Northern Company on the marked excellence of these releases.

BUFFALO BILL PICTURES.

That there is a merry war on in the film game may be evidenced from the fact of contention over the Buffalo Bill Wild West pictures. There are two kinds—Carl Goldenberg offers a set of pictures and along comes Pat Powers of moving picture fame (needless to say that Mr. Goldenberg, until very recently, was for years prominently identified with Pathe Freres).

Mr. Goldenberg offers a set of slide pictures taken while the Wild West-Far East was at Madison Square Garden and afterwards on the road. Every picture is colored and each shows some scene in action. Mr. Goldenberg was fortunate enough to catch Col. Cody with the camera in many unique positions—none of which have ever been reproduced in print. The set numbers twenty-five slides and range the entire show from beginning to end.

From the opening to finish the interest is maintained. Every detail stands out clearly; there are pictures of bucking bronchos, the attack on the stage coach, the greatest of Indian pictures showing Iron Tail, chief of the Ogallola Sioux and many other Indians who at one time fought Buffalo Bill.

These pictures were not taken hurriedly; out of nearly six hundred negatives used, these were selected as being the best—those really showing the great Wild West as it really is. From start to finish the interest is never permitted to lag—always something doing—something of particular interest.

Mr. Goldenberg is quite sure that the slide pictures will be a sensational hit—every one shows action and each is taken with particular care to please the patrons of moving picture theaters.

There are only two chances to see Buffalo Bill—if he has played your city he will never come back and if he hasn't here is the best way to witness the performance, away from the dust and excitement. In the twenty-five slides that Mr. Goldenberg puts out you will see the entire show just as it is playing to-day.

EDISON NOTES.

The climax of "The Great Secret," the full reel comedy by Roy Norton to be released September 13, is said to be one of the biggest laugh-winners ever filmed.

"Bumptious as a Fireman" will be released on September 16, and "Bumptious Plays Baseball," on October 7. The titles suggest the possibilities of each.

The first of the long expected Canadian pictures, done by a portion of the Edison stock company in the Canadian Northwest, will be released on September 20. In addition to telling a strong, interesting, dramatic story, the film, "An Unselfish Love," gives a clear idea of the marvelous farming possibilities of that country. Two more Canadian pictures will be released in the near future, one of them involving the Northwest Royal Mounted Police. These pictures were produced with the co-operation of the Canadian Pacific Railroad Company.

"Over Mountain Passes," to be released September 27, and "Chuncho Indians of the Amazon River, Peru," on October 14, are scenic and industrial films, respectively, taken by special operators sent to the Andes Mountains for the purpose.

"Ononko's Vow," a Colonial tale of the celebrated Deerfield (Mass.) massacres, will be released on September 30. This film has excited immense interest because of the elaborate manner in which it was produced. Some of the scenes were taken last Winter when three feet of snow lay on the ground, while other scenes were photographed at the height of the present Summer season when the foliage was both luxurious and abundant.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

Down at Manhasset Beach on the dunes of Long Island Sound there is a company of actors and actresses in scenes of plays grave and gay, including some of the most beautiful surfs lashing the rockbound coast or graceful waves quietly lapping the white sandy beaches; stirring rescues by daring swimmers and exciting speed-breaking dashes of launch and motor boats to the help of the foundering sailboats or the escaping villains, the very things that make a moving picture a work of art and lend brilliancy and variety to the photography. You can readily guess what company it is when you see the fleet of motor boats, launches and sails flying the "V"; it's the Vitagraph Company and you can rely upon it they will soon set before us a feast of Summer idyls and seaside dreams. They started on their final Summer campaign last Tuesday and the caravan of automobiles that started from the studio with supplies and company made quite a long and attractive procession.

Victor Smith, cashier of the Vitagraph, with his family, will start for Southern California on September 16 to visit his father and brothers, who live in that section of the country.

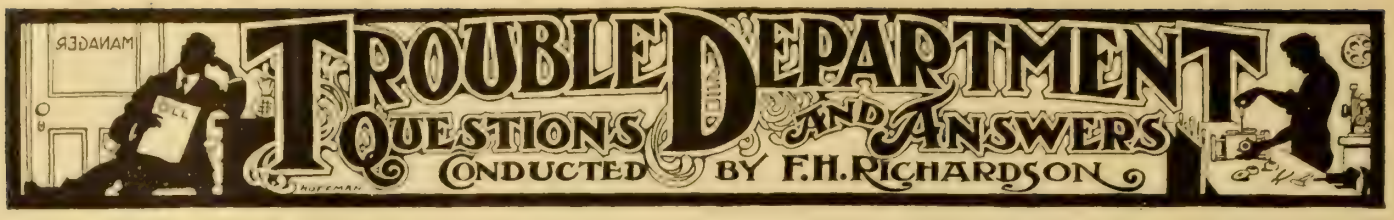
Walter McAdams, who has been with the Vitagraph Company for some years, has started in business for himself in the theatrical district on upper Broadway with a full line of costumes, "make-ups" and other theatrical accessories.

ESSANAY'S BASEBALL COMEDY MADE BIG HIT.

The Essanay Company's baseball comedy picture, "Take Me Out to the Ball Game," has proven one of the most successful comedy pictures that this firm has turned out in many months, and this is saying a great deal for the company whose comedy product is attracting so much favorable attention. Letters from exhibitors all over the country have been received and all speak in a complimentary way about the picture. S. I. Levine, of the Orpheum Theater, one of Chicago's largest motion picture theaters, spoke very highly of the baseball picture. "It is the best comedy we have had in many, many months," he said. "It is pretty hard to wake up a 9 o'clock audience, but we had them laughing all morning. The ladies seemed to like the picture particularly, and during the afternoon, when the house is chiefly composed of ladies and children, the house was in a continuous uproar all through the picture. We have had many requests to show the picture again and will repeat it within the next week or so. We show all the Essanay films and always find them good."

A SELIG MASTERPIECE OF SCENIC MAGNIFICENCE AND ACTION.

Scenes from "The Sergeant," a great military romance of the West, made in the wonderful Yosemite Valley by the Selig Polyscope Company. Apart from the dramatic element, the scenic beauties of this film will make it doubly interesting to those who have never visited the awe-inspiring region of the Valley of the Yosemite.



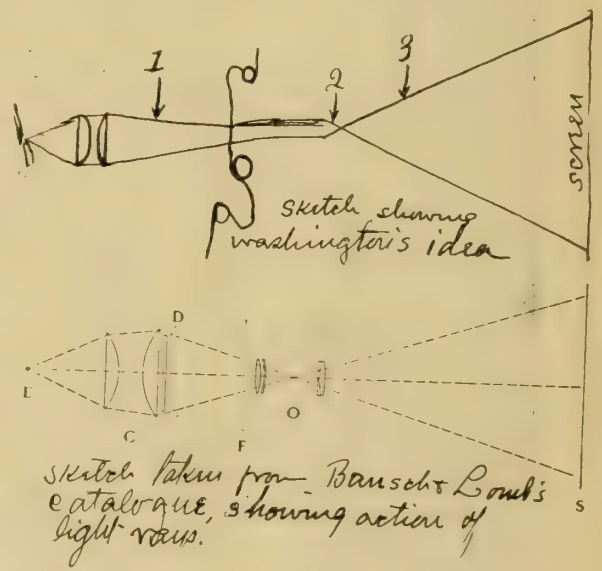
Testing.—Chicago, Ill., asks: "When my lamp is grounded how can I ascertain from which arm the current is escaping or if it be from neither arm?"

Attach a short wire to either binding post of an incandescent lamp socket and insert therein a four candle power lamp of, if possible, somewhat lower voltage than that of your circuit. Throw in the operating switch, but don't light the arc lamp. Now touch the end of one of your test lamp wires to one arm of the lamp near the carbon, first cleaning a spot on the metal with a file so that there will be good contact. Now touch the rack bars or base of the lamp with the end of the other wire and if your lamp lights the leakage is on the other arm. If it does not light, try it on the other arm the same way and if it lights the leak is on the arm first tried. If it lights on neither, then the ground is elsewhere. This is not an absolutely certain test, however, since it is possible that the lamp will be grounded through slight deposit of carbon dust, which will not convey sufficient current to affect the filament of even a small lamp. A more sure test is to (while the lamp is cold) turn on the current, insulate yourself on a wooden stool or rubber mat, and touch one finger to the carbon arm near the carbon and another finger to the lamp rack bars or base. If you feel a shock the ground is on the other arm of the lamp. The lamp house itself must be insulated from the ground, of course, to make these tests effective.

From Canada.—Regina, Sask., Canada, writes: "I have gained many useful hints from The Column and will now join the ranks of the seekers after knowledge, to the extent of a couple of questions. We have No. 4 service wires into the theater and have 83 sixteen candle power incandescent lights burning all the time, in addition to the arc. I believe this affects the projection light, as I have noticed that when we switch off seventy lights towards the end of the last show the light on the screen is improved. Have an Edison rheostat, 40-ampere capacity, and it is back to its lowest contact. Carbons burn steadily thus, but if we put the rheostat contact on full the light sputters and is hard to control. Have just put in a new No. 6 asbestos covered cable to the lamp and it is an improvement. Have alternating current, 60 cycle, 110 volt. Machine is an Edison and, though I say it myself, in excellent condition. My pictures very seldom jump out of frame. How far should cone of lamp house be from aperture? Mine is 8¾ inches. If it is moved I get dark shadow in center of picture. Can you advise me where I can get a good book on electricity—one suitable for an operator? Regina has a population of 15,000; has three theaters and two more opening shortly. The Empire, where I am operating, is the largest, seating 300. What does size of condenser, 6½, 7½, etc., mean? Am waiting anxiously for the handbook. Kindly let me know if there is an operators' union I can join."

Eighty-three 16 candle power 110-volt lamps will consume approximately 48 amperes of current. You are not quite clear as to the rheostat, but I assume it to deliver 40 amperes when all the resistance possible is cut out and that you are using it with all the coils in. As the Edison people put out more than one type of rheostat it is impossible for me to know just what you are pulling on the projection arc, but in-as-much as it is impossible to get anything like good light from 60-cycle alternating, through a rheostat, with less than 35 amperes, I will assume that to be the least you are pulling. This would make a total of 48, plus 35, which equals 83 amperes of current. Now, No. 4 wire is rated to carry 65 amperes rubber covered or 92 amperes weather-proof, so that the wires are not loaded above their capacity—provided they really are No. 4. One of three things is wrong, viz.: Your wires are too small somewhere, your service transformer is too small or your meter is too small. If your projection light is better when the incandescent lights are put out it is incontestable evidence that there is overload, causing line drop, somewhere. As to the lamp-house cone: The distance which gives best results is the distance which is right. It varies somewhat with different lens combinations. There is no definite rule. If you are running on meter I would get a transformer instead of that rheostat. It will save its price in less than a year and give you much better light, provided you get a good one. The condenser measurements named are the focal length of the lenses. You will find it explained in the handbook as well as in back numbers of The Column. No, I cannot advise you as regards the book. A work on electricity suited to the requirements of the operator is a very hard thing to find. Most of them are so technical one is unable to understand them, or else you have to buy a hundred pages of that which is of no earthly value to you to get one that is. The handbook is now all paged and the engraver is making the cover plates. It is possible that your No. 4 service circuit is quite long, thus causing the line drop. This is not likely, but possible. The remedy would be, of course, larger wires part of the way. As to the union matter I would suggest that secretary of union which you might join (if such there be) write you in my care and I will forward the letter promptly.

Ideas of His Own.—Washington, D. C., writes: "It may seem impertinent on my part to criticize yourself, but in an article on 'Light Rays,' August 6 issue, you claim that the light rays cross inside the lens, and with this I cannot agree. As I figure it out, the rays cross as per diagram. If a piece of cardboard be thrust down into the light at 1 it darkens the bottom of the curtain. At 2 it does the same thing, but about ten or twelve inches from the lens it darkens the top of the current. Now, Mr. Richardson, just try this out and see if I am correct. If not, then just drop this into your editorial waste-basket and one more fool crank-turner with a swelled head. In conclusion, would like to say that I read The Column every week and it has been of considerable help to me. I also expect to get your book just as soon as it is out."



I laughed when I read your letter, Washington. You started out as though you meant to "land on me" and wound up in compliments. Don't you for one second let the idea get place in your mind that I am not to be criticized or that I imagine I know all there is to know. I may be fairly well posted, and hope that I am, but I still have much to learn, as have we all. If you think I'm wrong on anything, by all means say so. Maybe I am, and if so I would like to be set right. Even though you were wrong that would be no reason for calling you a "swellhead." I like a man who has ideas of his own, and the man who never was wrong never had many original ideas. It is no disgrace to be mistaken, but it is a disgrace to shut yourself up like a clam in its shell for fear someone will find out that you have a wrong idea of something. Now as to the light rays: It is one g-r-e-a-t b-i-g subject, and an intelligent explanation of how the light rays really do act would require more space than this whole paper contains. The main focal axis of a projection lens is exactly half-way between its two factors, but light rays by the million are crossing and re-crossing in every direction. The film itself acts as the illuminant—the source of light—so far as the lens is concerned, and therein lies a goodly part of the puzzle. From each infinitesimal point on the film in the aperture, light rays shoot out to every point on the projection lens. This is absolutely proven by the fact that if one removes the front plate of the machine one can see every portion of film exposed in the aperture when illuminated by the arc, from any position in the room which is on the front side of the aperture. This proves that the rays, after penetrating the film, shoot out in every direction. All right! It follows, then, that rays from each point of the film picture reach each point of the lens, and it follows that all these millions of rays must be re-collected by refraction so that all rays from a given point on the film picture in the aperture will reach a given point on the screen. It also, therefore, follows that rays by the million must cross each other and that millions of them must, perforce, cross in front of the lens. Now if, as you claim, and as, I will admit, the experiments you suggest would seem to bear out, the main focal axis—the point where the picture rights itself—is located outside the lens, then it would seem that even such people as the Bausch & Lomb Company are all at sea and have been giving out misleading information, in proof of which I print, together with your own sketch, a drawing taken from the Bausch & Lomb catalogue of projection lenses. Frankly, the writer is puzzled. This lens proposition (refraction) would drive a man to arson, bigamy, or even petit larceny. The more one studies the subject the less one is sure he knows. Intelligent discussion on this subject will be welcomed. Come again, Washington! I will grasp the hand of the man with ideas, whether his views happen to coincide with my own or not. I by no manner of means call a man hard names because he disagrees with me. Only children and fools do that. Maybe he may be right and I wrong after all, in which event I shall learn something. Maybe I'm right, in which event he may learn something, so that someone is bound to be benefited and no one can possibly be injured by "talking it over."

Tension Equalizer.—Portage, Wis., writes: "Noted Rossellie's letter concerning take-up device, in August 13 issue. I have such a device now in the hands of patent agency. It would add somewhat to the mechanism, therefore to the cost of a machine, but I think it will do the work and do it positively. Would you suggest placing it before the Motion Picture Patents Company, the Edison Company or some of the big houses? Please advise what patent agency handles moving picture machine ideas as a specialty. I think you mentioned, some time since, Minnesota having a good take-up device. Please publish if you have space."

Portage has been privately advised as to how to handle his idea. Presenting it to the Motion Picture Patents Company would be a mere waste of energy. They do not consider such matters at all. I know of no patent agency handling motion picture machine ideas as a specialty. I do not remember publishing anything about a take-up device from Minnesota. If the take-up devised by Portage will equalize the film tension from the first revolution of the take-up reel to its last and has the other necessary points of flexibility, I believe the various machine companies would be obliged to adopt it, or something like it, sooner or later. The sooner the better.

Something Too Small.—Audubon, Iowa, writes: "I am using 104-volt, 133-cycle current. My wires from Type F, Huston transformer, 1040 P, 104 S, are No. 6. I use a compensarc. Am running one 10-inch and five 12-inch fans, also ¼-horsepower piano motor, all of which, including lobby and front lights, are hooked on in front of the arc. When projection arc is lighted it pulls the motors down and dims the incandescent lights. There is only one set of wires from secondary of transformer and no circuit but mine is hooked to it. Can you suggest a system of wiring that will prevent pulling down the lights? I use 45 amperes at the arc, use Bio carbons and think I have as good a light as can be had with 133 cycle current. The Column is the part I read first, just as soon as the paper comes each week."

Sounds like your transformer is overloaded. The piano motor and fans do not use current enough to amount to much, but if you have many front and lobby lights they soon mount up in current consumption. If the transformer is large enough and the meter (if you have one) is large enough, then the wires are too small. You may remedy this by running larger wires from the transformer to the point where the light circuits connect, supposedly the main house switchboard. I am not familiar with the Huston transformer, therefore am unable to say from markings given what its capacity is. In all probability that is where the trouble lies, however, in which case it is up to the light company to install a larger transformer.

From One of the Old Timers.—J. M. Nighswander, Lorane, Ore., sends in his subscription and writes thusly: "If possible, send me the papers from August 1; if not, start the paper as soon as possible, as I do not want to miss any more than I can help. I have an Edison one-pin exhibition model machine. Have used it both on the road and in small picture theaters, getting as good a picture as any and better than many picture theaters in the larger towns I pass through. I think from what I have read in the World that the small towns of Oregon have as good motion pictures as are to be seen elsewhere, and as I have been more or less connected with projection since the days of the fifty-foot subject, I have seen all kinds. Also, I have run pictures under widely varying conditions; from using acetylene gas for home entertainment (which, by the way, is a stunt I think would hold not a few operators, as I had to remodel a burner and use a sub-condenser to get a good bright picture, 3½ x 4½) to using D. C. from a sawmill plant, taking the current 500 feet on the strap iron rails of a lumber tram for lack of anything better, and getting a fine 8 x 10½ foot picture. Between stereopticon and moving pictures I have at different times used for illuminants, oil, acetylene, calcium and electric. Machines: The McAllister oil stereopticon, Edison Universal, Edison two-pin exhibition, one-pin exhibition, Underwriters' (Model B), Power's No. 4, Power's No. 5 and latest improved No. 6, the latter giving the steadiest picture I have ever seen. Now I think this is enough. If you want to use any of this, all right; fix it up as you like. Send the World is the main thing."

The above letter is given space from the fact that it is so evidently from one of the "Old Guard." It hints at things, now memories, familiar to all who were in the game of projection before the familiar clickety-click of the intermittent had been heard in the land and the nearest we had to "moving pictures" was a mechanical slide called a—there, I can't even think of the name of it any more. Anyhow, it had a crank at one end and when you turned the said crank very wonderful (?) things happened on the screen. Then came electricity as the illuminant, and the motion picture, and trouble in bunches and bundles for the operator. Put the operator of to-day up against some of the stunts pulled off in the very early days of the moving picture and he would drop dead from heart failure. Neighbor Nighswander's letter will awaken memories, now half forgotten, in the breast of many a one of the "Old Guard" and cause him to see in the smoke from his pipe scenes of the early days when the moving picture was in the throes of birth. That is why it is welcomed to The Column even though containing nothing of technical value.

Another from Salt Lake City.—From Salt Lake City comes another letter defending Salt Lake operators and complaining that the name of the man who wrote the roast was not printed. The letter also cites the fact that most of the Salt Lake City operators have been engaged in the work of projection for years. Aside from this the letter is practically the same as the one already published. We do not publish any letter, Salt Lake, unless the name is attached, but we do not publish the names, for very obvious reasons. Letters such as the one in question do much good, as a general proposition. They "stir things up" and while they make unjust accusations almost invariably when a blanket condemnation is made, still, those wrongly accused always have the opportunity to defend themselves and refute the charge, and I am sure you will realize that the shaking up is bound to do more or less good. The men who really are doing good work will be indignant, naturally, but they are more than likely to look their work over and see if they cannot yet further improve. The fellow who is doing poor work deserves all he gets. As to a man having been an operator for years, it certainly ought to be an evidence of competency, but it is not, I am sorry to say. Mere years adds little unless there is study. In fact, the old man who makes no effort to improve falls into a rut which will hold him to the end of his days unless he is jolted out. Projection is an art and the man who keeps a perfect picture on his screen must have some of the elements of the artist in his make-up. At any rate, he must have a range of accurate knowledge considerably wider than is required of any mere mechanical trade. The good operator must have brains and must be willing and able to use them. Write us occasionally, Salt Lake City, and keep us posted as to matters projectional in your fair city.

Later: Mr. John Kern, operator, Casino Theater, Salt Lake City, writes saying that some of the boys suspect him as the writer of the roasting letter. Most emphatically he was not. But he writes such an excellent letter that I shall take the liberty of publishing portions of it at an early date, though it evidently is intended as a personal letter.

Trouble with Focus.—Keyser, West Va., writes: "Availing myself of the invaluable benefits of The Column, I would appreciate a solution of the following: Sometimes I have a very sharp, clear, bright picture on every part of the screen; then, without having touched the lens adjustment, the picture becomes dim and, I would say, out of focus; then presently it becomes all right again. Then again the picture will be clear and bright in one portion and not in another. Can you help me?"

I should say that, beyond question, the trouble lies either in your aperture plate tracks or your tension springs, or in both. It probably is in the springs, however. Look carefully at your aperture plate tracks and if worn to any extent get a new plate at once. Set your tension springs so that they bear squarely on the tracks and then tighten the screws so that they will stay there. I am of the opinion that your springs are loose and shift from side to side, thus causing the film to buckle slightly as it passes the aperture. Worn aperture plate tracks would have the same effect. If the above does not appear to fit, write again, telling me what make of machine it is."

Lower Loop—Take-up Device.—Logan, Ohio, says: "I am another reader of The Column who never misses a week. It is the best ever to those who wish to improve their knowledge and work. I had some trouble recently from loosening the lower loop. After close examination I discovered that the lower, or take-up, feed sprocket was just a little loose on its shaft. Maybe this will be of assistance to someone else later on, therefore I send it in. And now, Mr. Richardson, about Rosedale's letter, August 13 issue, page 356: I have an arrangement that will tighten the take-up belt as the lower reel fills up, but it applies only to the ——— machine. It certainly does the work, and does it right, too. Is such an invention worth a patent or must it apply to all machines to be of value? Thanking you for reply, I remain a World reader as long as I can get it."

Glad you appreciate The Column and The World, Logan. If that bunch of feminine beauty on the letterhead is a regular adjunct to the Logan Opera House, I think I shall move West and settle near Logan, myself! Many thanks for the information concerning loose sprocket. That is what I like! It is what The Column is for—to exchange ideas and information of that sort so that each may help the other. As to the take-up device, it certainly would be of greater value if applied to all machines. You might take the matter up with the ——— company, but it has been my own experience that they are exceedingly loath to adopt new ideas and that they only improve where competition compels them to. I therefore doubt their giving you much satisfaction. In any event the idea should be protected by patent before it is sent to any company. I might be mistaken about that company, of course. I only give my own experience. If the device really works and is reasonably simple it is of undoubted value. More I could not say without knowing more of the details.

Central America.—Portland, Ore., writes: "Suppose you will wonder where I got your name. Well, while not connected with the business I buy the Moving Picture World regularly—nuf ced! A friend of mine in Central America writes asking me to find out what it costs to start a motion picture show. As I understand it, he enquires only concerning projection apparatus and film service. Will you kindly answer his questions?"

For $225 a complete projection outfit, including machine, lamp house, table and legs, lamp, lenses, connecting wires and rheostat, may be had from the Power's, Edison, Lubin, Enterprise Optical, Kleine Optical or any other company manufacturing projection machines. If it is alternating current and a transformer is desired instead of a rheostat, add about fifty dollars. If a half-size stereo lens is desired instead of quarter-size, add about ten dollars. There are cheaper outfits, but I would by no means recommend them. I would suggest that you write the N. Power Company, 117 Nassau street, New York City, the Edison Company, Orange, N. J.; the Kleine Optical Company, 52 North State street, Chicago, Ill., and the Enterprise Optical Company, 83 West Randolph street, Chicago, Ill., requesting them to send machine catalogues to your friend. As to film service, I cannot advise, since rates to Central America would naturally be rather high, the shipment requiring a great deal of time. I think service should be had from some Mexican or some Cuban exchange, since probably the reading matter in Spanish would be most desirable. Film service rates depend on (a) time from date of leaving exchange to return; (b) proportion of time in use to time in transit; (c) age of service, i. e., time from day of release by manufacturer. I trust the foregoing may be of assistance. I could not say more without going very much into details.

Setting the Intermittent.—Grand Forks, N. D., writes: "Will you kindly tell me what is the proper way to set the eccentric bushings so that the star and cam will run true? There are several ways to do this and I want to know the best. I would also like to ask: Is it right for a manager or a proprietor after turning over the operating room to an operator to come into the operating room and take hold of any part of the machine, standing still, before or after the show or while the show is running? I have seen managers do this in several places. I, for one, consider myself discharged as soon as they take hold. I am always glad to have a manager tell me anything that he thinks is wrong and I will immediately make it right."

As to setting the bushings, the whole thing is to eliminate the lost motion between the star and cam, at the same time keeping the two shafts (cam and star shafts) exactly parallel to each other. As you say, there are many ways of doing this. The slots in the bushings are always in the same relative position to the hole, so that if one screw-driver slot has the same angle as the other the two shafts are parallel. As to the other matter, I don't think I quite comprehend your exact meaning. Surely you do not mean that you object to a manager or owner coming into the operating room and laying his hand on the machine! If the manager or owner comes into the operating room and interferes with my work, either he or I will get out, and that real sudden, too; but I have no objection to the man coming in, or to his laying his hand on the machine, provided he does not, as I said before, interfere with my work.

Closed Shop! Boston, writes.—"Inclosed you will find a newspaper clipping. It is some good news for you. You will greatly favor Moving Picture Machine Operators' Protective Union, Nocal No. 182, I. A. T. S. E., if you will publish same in your next issue. Thanking you for past favors."

The Clipping.

Forty moving-picture proprietors, representing almost every film-show in the city, to-day are included in the list given out by Moving Picture Operators' Protective Union, Local No. 182, I. A. T. S. E., as agreeing to employ none but union operators.

The union's committee also states that the proprietors of sixty other such places, doing business in Revere, Chelsea, Cambridge and other outlying towns and cities, will enter into a like agreement in the near future.

This practically completes the unionization of the moving picture business in Boston. It also is a guarantee, the men say, that the amusement seeking public will be fully protected against fires and accidents through the employment of incompetent operators.

The union, they assert, looks out for this by subjecting every man to an even more rigid test than does any public licensing board before admitting him into membership.

Although no figures are given out for publication, it is said that the agreement entered into between the picture-house proprietors and the union carries with it provisions for hours, wages and working conditions satisfactory to both parties. This agreement was secured by the following committee: Max Goodman, James Burke and Fred Clark, who also are conducting the negotiations with the other film show proprietors in the outlying cities.

The men's union to-day has ninety-five good-standing members, and was organized May 1 of this year. The local board of officers consists of J. J. Barry, president: Cecil True, vice-president; Lawrence Tempest, financial secretary, and Harry Danto, recording secretary and treasurer."

Congratulations Boston! Now be careful, insisting on your just dues, remembering, however, that the boss also has rights. I shall speak at length of these things next week. This was received at the very last moment this week.

Chicago Notes.

Hobart Bosworth, the well-known leading man of the Selig forces, has, through the courtesy of Mr. Selig, been loaned to the Belasco stock company, of Los Angeles, Cal., and will appear next week in a special production of "The Servant in the House."

Mr. Porter, of the Motion Picture Screen Company, Shelbyville, Ind., spent a day in Chicago on his return from a trip through the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. Hoof, of Rockford, Ill., and Mr. Mitchell, of Vinton, Iowa, were visitors at the new office of the Moving Picture World this week.

THE ELGIN MOTOR RACE FILM.

People connected with a moving picture publication see a great variety of pictures, and under all sorts of conditions. Naturally, the continued practice of inspecting and criticizing the pictures makes one almost "film proof," and often, unless the pictures are out of the ordinary, it is difficult to make more than a few passing remarks regarding the merits of any particular release. Monday evening, after the banquet at the Chicago Athletic Association, given in honor of the drivers in the National Motor Races held at Elgin, August 26 and 27, the American Motor Racing Picture Company, of Chicago, exhibited the pictures of the event, and, to say the least, they were splendid. This was the first attempt of this company to picture anything quite so difficult as an auto race, but they have every reason to feel proud of their success. The photography is excellent, especially where the cars are shown rounding the "hairpin" turn, and all the features of both days' races are well portrayed. In all, about 2,000 feet of film was shown, and the feature that appealed to me most was the fact that the pictures are free from all hair-raising "spills" and accidents, as was usually the case with racing pictures heretofore. Watching the cars come down the course at the speed of 62 miles an hour is surely interesting enough without working in any accidents. E. F. Seavolt, the manager of the American Motor Racing Association, had charge of the exhibition, and was very highly complimented by the members of the Chicago Motor Club and the Elgin Road Racing Association, and especially by the drivers of the various cars, on the success of his efforts, and this very favorable criticism by the principal actors in the pictures themselves should in itself prove to be a well-deserved testimonial of the merits of the pictures. It is the intention of the manufacturers to produce a 1,000-foot reel of the most interesting part of this subject, the release of which they are advertising for the 10th of September, and in all probability there will be a great demand on the part of the exhibitors and the public for this film.

OPENING OF THE "LYDA" THEATER.

Who says that motion pictures are dying out? Yes, the cheap dumps with a store front and only 100 or 150 chairs are fast disappearing and we are not sorry. On the other hand, larger and more expensive houses are springing up on every side and the would-be or amateur exhibitor is now replaced by experienced showmen. As the 1st of September is here, the new openings are so numerous that it is a hard task to keep in touch with all of them.

The Lyda, on Forty-eighth street, near Lake street, Chicago, opened its doors on Monday evening, August 29, and promises to be the leading amusement place on the West Side of the Windy City. The opening day was a gala affair. The stage, the lobby and the front of the house were beautifully decorated with potted plants and fresh cut flowers. The inside of the Lyda was a general rendezvous for all persons interested in motion pictures. Wm. N. Selig, of the Selig Polyscope Company, was there with his family and was surrounded by a group of other well-known film men; also Mr. Hardin, of the Edison Company; Mr. Aiken, of the General Film Company; Mr. Goble, of the Kleine Optical Company, and many others. The licensed interests were not the only ones represented in this happy gathering, as the Independents were there to wish to Mr. and Mrs. George Hines a long success, with Miss Horn to represent the Laemmle Film Service.

The new house of Mr. Hines, named in honor of Mrs. Hines, is a new building erected specially as a theater. It is very neat in design and on the order of hardwood and marble, with enough plastic decorations to make it tasteful. It is a house to last for years and not one of these temporary gingerbread buildings to last one season. Although the lot is only 100 x 50 feet, Mr. Hines managed to put in 1,010 seats by providing a large and commodious gallery. The lobby, although small, is in itself a "Bijou", yet it is rich in its simplicity; the woodwork is mahogany with colored glass; the walls are of a beautiful marble; the plastic decorations over the doors and windows are simple but tasteful, and the chandeliers are of an exquisite pattern. The auditorium, finished in a light chocolate color, with gilded trimmings, is very rich, yet simple. In all it is a beautiful house and a very safe place, as wide aisles and numerous exit doors are provided. Numerous polite ushers in bright new uniforms added much to the charm of the place and gave the impression that the Lyda would be a well-conducted and safe house for ladies and children.

Mr. Hines has spared no money and has provided everything for the safety and comfort of his patrons. Mr. Hines has next to his house a large store which he has connected with his theater, and he is fitting this store into an elegant waiting room, with chairs and everything to insure a comfortable refuge to his patrons during the stormy Winter days. Next to this waiting room is a confectionery store and ice cream parlor, and by a mutual arrangement between Mr. Hines and his neighbor, a door has been provided and the patrons will have a chance to treat themselves to candy and ice cream, while waiting a chance to enter the theater. With a first-class program and a complete orchestra, Mr. Hines is providing an amusement place deserving the patronage of the best families of the neighborhood.

We wish to Mr. and Mrs. Hines the best success and we hope that in the course of time the Lyda will prove to be the moving picture house on the West Side of Chicago.

A MISERABLE SHOW.

Last evening, while taking a stroll on Madison street, I was tempted to visit a motion picture theater, called the Casino, but when I paid my nickel, I had no idea that I was entering a lunatic asylum. The music was enough to make anyone crazy—the worst ragtime music ever heard. While the pianist was doing his very best to break down the piano, the drummer used his sticks on everything within his reach; the edge of the stage, the floor, the chairs, etc., were his favorites. He never looked at the screen, but, acting as a crazy man without an ounce of common-sense, he gave us the sound effects at his own pleasure, without any consideration of the picture. During the mountain climbing scenes in "The Shepherd and the Maid," by Gaumont, when the tourists are seen passing over rocks, by means of ropes and alpinstocks, where no automobiles could be seen—in fact, where no vehicle of any kind could travel—the drummer tooted several times his auto horn. Same with his bells and whistles; he would use them in scenes where they were not called for. Both the pianist and the drummer so much disregarded the picture, that when the maid meets a sad accident and falls down the mountain, these clever musicians pitched themselves to the highest and most noisy ragtime music ever played in a theater, as if the fall of the maid and her agony were part of a carnival. These musicians were so devoid of common-sense that they could not appreciate the bad impression they were creating, but, on the contrary, seemed to take the sarcastic laughter of a few spectators, as a mark of approval.

Was that all? No. The operator does not seem to be able to keep a good focus on his picture, and we were shown a film which should have been returned to the manufacturers a long time ago. The renter who dared to put out such old junk, should have his license cancelled at once. It was an outrage. The film was an old Vitagraph. The title and half of the first and last scenes were missing, with many more cuts in the inside of the reel. The film had surely shrunk some 300 feet. The sprocket holes must have been in pretty bad condition, as the picture was all the time out of the frame and the operator had to stop several times to make some patches. It was certainly a piece of old junk in every sense of the word.

To this add a dirty, wrinkled curtain and a very slim attendance and you will understand why I was dissatisfied with my evening.

This statement is made for the good of motion pictures. It is our duty to expose such careless managers. They should not be allowed to run a show. Motion pictures have already too many enemies, too many persons doing their best to kill them, and if we want to save them for future generations we must take the bull by the horns, and the best way to bring back some of these exhibitors to some common-sense, is to expose th

Where was the manager? I don't know. As to the owner, he was perhaps too busy watching his billiard room or his waiters to see that they did not forget to charge a cup of coffee. Most likely the owner will tell us that as his billiard room and his lunch rooms are paying him big money, while his Casino is a loser, he pays little attention to the show business to watch more closely his other interests. This is no excuse. The Casino should be a big money-maker, even in July and August, as it is well located in the district of the Loop, with a daily transient trade. Why not? Look at the Orpheum, crowded to the doors; look at the Garfield, the Elite, the Gilmore, the Orchard, the Janet and many other houses claiming that their Summer season has been as good as the Winter months; but then they are well-managed houses, showing pictures to the best advantage and with appropriate music. J. M. B.

A NEW MUSICAL INSTRUMENT.

As we have constantly advocated good music with motion pictures, we are always pleased to call the attention of our readers to anything new, pertaining to music and sound effects. J. C. Deagan, of Chicago, is the patentee of several church and organ chimes and of several new traps used for sound effects. Lately Mr. Deagan placed on the market an entirely new invention, which appeals strongly to motion picture theaters. It is a combination of electric bells, tuned to the piano and placed in different parts of the house. The pianist plays on the keyboard of the instrument any piece of music at his disposal and the musical sounds come from every corner of the theater, giving a pleasing and novel effect. It is a real novelty which attracts a good deal of attention and is the direct cause of many favorable comments on the part of the visitors. This is what the exhibitors need—some free talk on the outside—as every favorable comment is the best advertiser. The cost of this new instrument is only $75, a trifle, when the good advertising results are considered. Try one of them and you will have it paid in full within two weeks on the increased receipts.

THE THANHOUSER TWO-A-WEEK.

Let the light of fame fall on Nicholas Jordan, the only colored member of the Thanhouser acting company. It was Jordan who aroused so much comment amongst picture patrons by his clever comedy work in "The Actor's Children," where he portrayed the blackface vaudevillian in the closing theater scene, and in "Booming Business," where he appeared as the unfortunate who wished his optics treated by the expert who advertised: "Black Eyes Cured."

It must be mentioned that "Nick," as the colored comedian is familiarly known, is only an occasional member of the Thanhouser players—in fact, plays with them merely when he isn't busy at his larger, higher task. This is the gentle art of keeping the Thanhouser floors bright and shining and the Thanhouser ceilings free of all cobwebs.

"The Thanhouser Kid" appears next in a playlet written especially for her by Lloyd F. Lonergan, to wit: "The Doctor's Carriage," released Friday, September 9. The "Kid" does credit. That the "Kid" appreciates the honor accorded her is apparent from the picture. See it at your exchange when the put it on the screen, and then get your advertising matter ready.

HALLBERG ECONOMIZER IN SANFORD, FLA.

A. De Cottes has taken out his old current saver and put in a Hallberg Standard 110-Volt 60-Cycle Economizer. His operator saw a "Hallberg" in the "Bonita" at Tampa, Fla., and was so impressed with the good light that he prevailed on Mr. De Cottes, his proprietor, to get one.

WHO CALLED UPON VAUDEVILLE?

Or, The Man Who Struck Billy Patterson.

To the Editor:

In your issue of August 27 I notice an article by Mr. C. W. Lawford entitled "Why Vaudeville Was Called Upon," and after careful reading I am of the opinion that Mr. Lawford has missed the mark entirely. I may be wrong, but I have put Mr. Lawford down for a theater manager.

I no doubt am presuming by expressing my opinion in the face of Mr. Lawford's "eighteen years of experience before, and dealing with, that most fickle animal, 'the public,' but by exercising what intelligence God has seen fit to give me, together with my own knowledge acquired," I will now break into print.

"Vaudeville was called upon" because it afforded a means of price-cutting, and nothing else. It is through this same hole that ninety per cent. of the new comers have crawled and broken into the various branches of the motion picture business during the past four or five years.

I might cite any number of cases, but what's the use? I'm not getting a dollar a word.

To be sure, "the picture is nothing more than a reflection on the curtain," but music and the human voice are nothing more than vibrations, but if a man can stand for some of the moving picture vaudeville vibration he is certainly going some.

As regards the "novelty and variety" of vaudeville: If the same old acts, the same old gags, the same old songs perpetrated by the same old teams year after year constitute "novelty and variety," then vaudeville must be all that Mr. Lawford claims for it.

One of the finest examples of "novelty and variety" that I can recall is the Russell Brothers in the "Two Irish Servant Girls." I saw this team in this sketch over thirty years ago at Miner's Bowery Theater, and they played it without change year after year, until an outraged public rotten-egged them off the stage in Brooklyn a year or so ago.

As far as "novelty and variety" are concerned, there is no comparison between vaudeville and moving pictures.

I wonder if Mr. Lawford can recall the time—and it's only four or five years ago—that a reel of pictures was good for one week, the same as any vaudeville act.

How is it to-day. Why, nothing less than three and as many as six or seven reels, seven times a week. And still there is no variety or novelty to moving pictures, and they are nothing but "a mere reflection on a curtain."

What has brought this about? Nothing but price-cutting or giving more for the same money. Who is to blame? First of all, the managers and owners of the theaters. They are at the bottom of the whole trouble; and next, the exchanges who are willing to supply the service. I hardly know which is the more guilty.

It is an awful burden the theater managers have placed upon the manufacturers, and if there is a lack of variety and novelty to the picture to-day the theater maangers can put it right themselves.

How many song writers and sketch writers would it require to produce some forty new songs or sketches every week with "novelty and variety" in each?

The theater managers have never given the pictures a square deal. The pictures have always had the worst of it.

I know a certain theater on a very prominent circuit where the pictures are always rehearsed for the manager. "I've seen that picture. Cut it out!" is the most frequent criticism of Mr. Manager. That's all there is to it. And yet on the other hand on the very same program there are vaudeville acts which he has seen, and played in the same theater scores of times. Exchanges advertise "no repeaters." This is an unpardonable sin—to ring in one.

I know what it costs to produce high-class moving pictures like "The Midnight Ride of Paul Revere," "The Blue and the Gray," "The Dream of a Rarebit Fiend," and "The Great Train Robbery," and I know that each one of them cost more brains, ability, real effort and money than seventy-five per cent. of the best vaudeville acts now before the public.

I wish Mr. Lawford would exercise the intelligence which God has evidently not seen fit to give me, and tell me why such pictures as I have mentioned can only be shown once while a team of sidewalk conversation "hams" dressed up like advertising clothes dummies and murdering the Queen's own, can hand out their line of disgusting stuff and get return dates?

Bum vaudeville can't hurt bum pictures, but bum vaudeville will put good pictures on the bum.

All of which leads me to the conclusion that the moving picture business is no longer a proper business for a white man. ALEX. T. MOORE.

THE MUSIC AND THE SHOW.

New York, August 28, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In your issue of September 3 I read an article pertaining to "pipe organs" in moving picture shows. The writer condemns their use, stating that they are only practical during the running of religious film.

It is my desire to correct this impression, as there are to-day many progressive exhibitors who are using instruments successfully which are termed by many, "pipe organs." Of course, I will agree with you that a church organ is not appropriate for a picture show, and as far as a parlor organ is concerned, the need for it arises so seldom, that the advisability of an exhibitor investing his hard-earned money in one is questionable.

The instruments I refer to as being successful in picture shows are the new style piano orchestras, instruments that have only recently been perfected and put on the market. There is no question but these new instruments, now manufactured only in Germany, at Vohrenbach, by Imhof & Mukle, are so fine musically that they cannot be compared with any but the highest priced human orchestras in the world. These wonderful instruments are truly a great twentieth century discovery. Of course, I know that you will not advise an exhibitor to dismiss his pianist and trap drummer to substitute for them one of these new instruments, nor would you advise the same exhibitor to invest his money in an aeroplane, as neither the piano-orchestra nor the aeroplane have been given the final tests to prove that they will take the place of the older methods of playing or will fly. It makes me smile, though, when I hear an intelligent exhibitor ask the question whether or not the piano-orchestra will "follow the pictures." Of course it will not. But, all said and done, how near does it come to being essential that the pictures be "followed" by the music. I will grant that a slapstick comedy necessitates the use of a lot of "traps," but, as you are well aware, very little slapstick comedy is now being turned out by the manufacturers in this country, and as far as the foreign manufacturers are concerned, their product is becoming less in demand every day.

Can you compare the music furnished by a trap drummer and pianist to popular overtures of famous masters played only as the finest large orchestras can play them? You will admit that you cannot. We are undoubtedly coming to better things in the film business. The manufacturers and exhibitors are doing everything in their power to raise the plane of their undertakings and are doing what they can to educate their patrons. Why is it not feasible, then, that the people would appreciate high-class overtures instead of the popular "junk" that is the height of the ability of most of our nickelodeon musicians. Of course, the popular music can be had, too, but it is the overtures and the operas that show the ability of the performers. One exhibitor whom I have in mind, who secured one of these new instruments, bought it only to be used during the afternoon and during intermission. His patrons, however, were so insistent that the instrument be operated in the evening, that he was influenced to dismiss his pianist and drummer. He now says that he could not be tempted to go back to the old way. He further says that he has almost as many patrons coming in to hear his orchestra perform as he has to see his pictures. This exhibitor is Chas. Hunt, proprietor of the Van Ness Hippodrome, 630 Morris Park avenue, Bronx. Many others are just as extravagant in their praise. The piano-orchestra will not only increase an exhibitor's receipts but it can be made at the same time to decrease his running expenses considerably, as the instruments can be bought on small monthly payments. I write you this letter in defense of the pipe organ and its distant relative, the piano-orchestra, because I believe you have the interest of the exhibitor at heart, and if you will investigate the merit of this instrument manufactured by Imhof & Mukle, I am assured that you will recommend its use to exhibitors who wish to cut on expenses without losing business. The instrument as an "added attraction" would pay for itself within a few short months. It is perhaps a strong statement for me to make in declaring that the Imhof & Mukle piano-orchestra can play as only the finest orchestras in the world, but when you realize that this is the twentieth century and "an automatic age" you may perhaps come to the conclusion that my statements are not exaggerated.

Trusting that you may make an appointment with me to see these instruments demonstrated, I am,

A SUMMER IDYL

A Beautiful Biograph Pastoral

Here is a story of what really does happen in life, for while we show the poetic side of the episode the finish is as it usually turns out in reality. A young artist falls in love with a girl who is also an artist. He proposes to her, but she laughs at his proposition. Disheartened he goes to the country where he meets a pretty little shepherdess for whom he forms quite an attachment. This ripens into love, but this is short duration, for the young lady artist, regretting her action lures him back to her. This is the way it usually happens. Simple life is all right for a while, but it palls.

LITTLE ANGELS OF LUCK

Saved from Ruin with the Children's Help

The head of the Independent Sugar Company is holding staunchly against the Trust until his partner plays the Judas and sells him out. He finds himself a ruined man. His children, two little tots, hearing the conversation between mama and papa about the affair, understand that the President of the Trust took Papa's money from him, and go to the trust offices to proffer their savings from their little bank, that papa's money may be returned. The sincere innocence of the children appeals to the Sugar King so strongly that he offers the papa a most lucrative position with the corporation.

STORIES OF THE FILMS

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

A SUMMER IDYL.—Fascination and infatuation are simply forms of hypnotism. They are like habits formed and almost impossible to crush. Such was the fate of Albert Woodson, a talented young artist, who became madly infatuated with Cora Irwin, a fellow artist. Cora's atelier was the rendezvous of the members of the higher Bohemia, and at her little receptions there always gathered the men and women of arts and letters. Among them was Albert Woodson, and during the course of one of these affairs he proposes marriage to the seemingly nonchalant Cora, who regards his protestation as a joke and laughingly rejects his proposal. Despondent, Albert goes to his home and decides to take a long walking trip in the country, where he hopes to crush that infatuation for the heartless Cora. As he trudges through the fields, his mind is occupied admiring the beauty of the land, which enthralls him so as to almost forget the cold hearted artist. Here he meets a pretty little shepherdess as she feeds her sheep. Her artlessness and beauty make such an impression on him that Cora has now gone entirely from his thoughts. It is a case of love at first sight, and it is not all one sided, for the little maid is attracted by him. She indeed falls deeply in love with him. Cora, meanwhile, has regretted her action, and learning Albert's address, sends him the following letter: "Dear Albert: I was only teasing when I laughed at your proposal. Come to me. Your Cora." This note reaches Albert while he is out strolling with the little shepherdess. He mentally compares the two and decides in favor of the country maiden so Cora's plea is ignored. To be by the little one's side, Albert engages as a farmhand, and the poor old grandpa of the girl, with whom she lives, seeing them so much together, anticipates that he will soon be left in loneliness. Cora, determined to win him back, makes a more subtle endeavor. She writes a second note: "Dearest: Why don't you come to me? I am giving a little reception in your honor. Do please grace the occasion. With heart yearning, Your own Cora." Before sealing the letter she encloses the butt of a cigarette which she has been smoking. Albert at first is inclined to treat this second letter as he did the first, but the sight and aroma of the cigarette conjure up in his mind the fascinating scenes of Bohemia and his old infatuation returns. The city's call is irresistible, and back he goes to the gayeties of the metropolis. The farm scenes shown during the course of the story are undoubtedly the most beautiful ever photographed, showing farm life as it really is.

LITTLE ANGELS OF LUCK.—Language fails when endeavoring to fully describe the wonderful influence of the child upon matters of great moment in life. Often are they made the messengers of Divine Providence also the tools in the hand of fate. Thir plea is a demand irresistible, and in this Biograph subject is shown how their childish sincerity lifts from the household the impenetrable clouds of despair. Edward Rose, as president of the Independent Sugar Company, has proved a formidable antagonist of the giant Sugar Trust. His is the only concern which has withstood its advances, and so it is a most desirable acquisition. Rose has received an intimation, that really amounts to a threat, it would be of mutual benefit should he submit gracefully. He, however, is adamant in his defiance, showing a commendable pugnacity that is admired by the trust's president himself. But in every battle we must look for the traitor and Rose's partner plays the Judas, so that the next morning finds Rose a ruined man, sold out to the trust by his own partner. Crushed in spirit Rose goes home, where his wife is now acquainted with the disaster through the newspapers. The two children are amazed and hurt at their papa's cold negligence, and are at a loss to know why he should so ignore them, and they become little eavesdroppers at the door of the reception room into which Mr. and Mrs. Rose have gone to talk over the calamity. From what they hear they understand that the president of the Sugar Trust took papa's money away from him, so they take the savings from their little bank and tender it to help papa. Their papa is too occupied with his gloomy thoughts to notice the little ones. Suddenly a bright idea occurs to Alice. "We will go to see President Sugar Trust." Writing a note and enclosing their savings they start off, these two innocent children, for Wall street, having gotten the address from the telephone book. There they trudge hand in hand, a sort of new species of lambs in the street. They insist upon seeing the Sugar King at once. Brought before him, little Alice hands him her note which reads: "Deer Prezident Shugar Trust:—Papa ses you tok all hiz money. Pleze take our's insted and give him hiz.—Alice and Ruth." At the same time she proffers her savings. The old gentleman, being a family man with children and grandchildren in whom he is wrapped up, is deeply touched by the innocent candor of these little tots, and, turning to his desk, writes a letter to their papa, with which they return, their absence not even having been noticed. This letter offers their papa a position as General Manager of the sugar interests with a salary of $15,000 a year.

EDISON MFG. CO.

THE GREAT SECRET.—Miss Laura Guth, a clever American woman, is engaged by a firm of New York corset makers through their representative, Mr. Frederick Schmaltz, to go to Paris and make designs of the forthcoming fashions in Parisian corsets. Miss Guth is admonished to keep her movements as secret as possible so that the rival concerns in America will not know of her actions. Miss Guth proceeds with her work.

One day she seeks the quiet of a French fortification to do some sketching. She happens to think of some lines in the latest design she is drawing and standing at the base of one of the big cannon she proceeds to insert some additions to her sketch. Finishing this she places it in her suitcase. In traveling Miss Guth carries a kodak, and seeing a pretty scene before her she takes a snapshot. This action is witnessed by a sentry who, instead of arresting the lady on the spot for having a camera within the fortifications, runs to his superior officer and reports the incident. This functionary feels that he should report the matter to the Commandant, which he proceeds to do. After receiving his order from the Commandant the officer returns with the sentry to find that Miss Guth has taken her departure.

This simple incident is worked up into a tremendous affair because the German Government is supposed to have had agents endeavoring to get photographs and plans of the French fortifications. The matter is finally brought to the attention of the Minister of War, who calls to his office The Captains Three, Captains Dunois, Villalon and Lepard—three clever, adventurous, military Frenchmen. He shows them a letter from the secret service department which relates that Miss Laura Guth, the American woman who is suspected of having photographs and plans of the fortifications at Rheims and of being an emissary of the German Government, has evaded the vigilance of the secret service men and has no doubt gone to London on route for New York. The Minister of War dispatches the three men to get Miss Guth and the plans.

The story now follows The Captains Three. We see them board the American liner in mid-stream, and we watch their actions on shipboard throughout the voyage to New York. We know what The Captains Three do not,—that they are on a false scent. They are most serious in their pursuit of Miss Guth who has booked her passage under a fictitious name in order to preserve secrecy. Captain Lepard has met Miss Guth, little knowing that she is the person he is seeking, and has become enamored of her. He discovers who she is by her accidentally leaving with him a magazine in which her visiting card is marking the page. When Lepard discovers that the girl to whom he has been paying serious attention is the woman his Government is seeking to implicate in the commission of a national crime his inward struggle is most dramatic. Torn between love and duty, finally duty wins and he confides to his fellow officers what he has discovered.

From now on the three men watch Miss Guth closely. We see Lepard, who has heretofore been the soul of chivalry and attention, avoiding the lady as much as possible. Miss Guth does not understand the gallant Frenchman's conduct, and there is a frigidity which is intelligible only to the audience. The three Frenchmen watch Miss Guth through the porthole of her stateroom and see her taking plans from her suitcase and reading a letter. After she leaves the room they enter it, and finding the plans locked in the suitcase are somewhat taken back. They read the letter, however, from Frederick Schmaltz and become convinced that they are on the track of a great conspiracy.

Arriving in New York they follow Miss Guth, never taking their eyes from the suitcase in her hand. From the Custom House they follow her through the streets of New York in a taxicab, arriving at her Fifth avenue apartment shortly after she does. They enter the parlor a few minutes after her, and then the big dramatic and comedy scene of the picture is enacted. The Frenchmen are filled with diverse emotions. Civility to a lady, duty to France and a feeling that they are in the presence of a great national criminal struggle for dominance. Captain Lepard is torn with varied feelings. We see that he is evidently deeply in love with the girl he is about to take before the Consul of his country. The whole situation is turned into a tremendous laugh when Miss Guth finally discovers what they seek,—namely, the plans which has in her bag. These she shows to the gentlemen, to their intense chagrin and disappointment. Captain Lepard is simply flabbergasted. Miss Guth had felt that she loved him until she became conscious of his peculiar, uncertain attitude. She now feels that Lepard merely made love to her thinking that she was a German spy and for the purpose of capturing her. She tells him so. The impulsive Frenchman throws himself upon his knees and tells her it was nothing of the sort,—that in his heart he had a deep and passionate regard for her. He begs her to accept him as her suitor, which she finally does.

Mama has a birthday, also some company. The cook quits and general trouble comes by the wagon load, windlng up with an indication of burglars in the house, but it all worked out right in the end. IT IS TO LAUGH.

THE GREAT SECRET

By ROY NORTON

A young and charming American girl is sent to Paris to secure special designs for the latest corset. She is mistaken for a spy who has furnished plans of French fortifications to Germany and is followed to America by three captains of the French Army. They don't get the plans but one of them secures something of far more value. A delightfully high class comedy, much of the action being on an Ocean liner.

Approximate Length, 990 Feet

RELEASED SEPT. 16th

BUMPTIOUS AS A FIREMAN

Comedy subject showing Bumptious made Chief of the Volunteer County Fire Department. He is presented with a horn and cap for his supposed bravery, but when called to what they believe to be a real fire, he loses his wits, gets tangled up in the hose, etc.

FROM THE ARCTICS TO THE TROPICS

Showing a trip from the top of a snow covered Peruvian mountain 16,000 feet above the sea, to the bottom of the mountain, by gravity railroad, literally from the Arctics to the Tropics and probably the only such change in the world. The scenery is magnificent.

of Scotch in one hand, his bottle in the other, and an "Up Caddy Day" on his lips.

A description of the treatment of Buck will be reserved until you see the film.

HE MET THE CHAMPION. Willie Nutt, an aspirant to athletic honors, thinks he sees some easy money when he reads Professor Brawn's notice in the lobby of a theater offering $100 to anyone who will put him on his back.

Willie resolves to make a try, and passing a book store observes in the window a volume labeled "How to Wrestle." No sooner seen than bought, and Willie immediately goes into training. Willie reads the book as he walks home, and becomes interested in the passage "grab your opponent by the calf of the left leg and toss him on his knee." Willie wants to experiment, and a passing Chinaman, with a bundle of wash on his back, is the victim. The two are soon struggling together, and a lively match ensues, but the Chinaman breaks away and runs down the street yelling "murder" and "police."

Willie's next victim is an automobilist stretched out under his machine hammering at a loose bolt. Willie drags the chauffeur from under the machine, throws down a blanket for a mat and proceeds to lay about the surprised fellow for all he is worth. The autoist resents the attack, however, and Willie is somewhat the worse for the encounter when he is kicked on his way.

Willie's other victims are a chap scrubbing a walk, a woman beating a carpet and a young fellow washing windows. Willie gets off comparatively easy with the two former, but when the window washer gets him he hurls him through the window onto a dining table, demolishing an excellent repast. He does not linger long, however, but is hurled out the window again, bruised and sore.

After other adventures Willie feels he has had sufficient training and goes to the theater to meet the champion. When the usual invitation is extended the audience, Willie is on his feet and with his valuable book in his hand goes to meet the champion.

The following scene is one of the funniest ever. Willie constantly consults his book, and is an easy mark for the big wrestler. The latter finally takes him by the neck, hurls him around his head several times and deposits him on the mat, flat on his back. After some time Willie is able to arise and then and there makes the solemn resolve: "Never again!"

THE COW PUNCHER'S SWEETHEART.—The cow puncher of the story is a splendid type of the young Western ranchman who has incurred the enmity of a renegade Indian horse thief by running him down and bringing him to justice. The Indian, full of revenge, attempts to strike at the cowboy through his sweetheart, and the girl is captured and taken into the Indian camp. The cow punchers get word of it, however, and there is a horseback chase which will delight all lovers of fine horse flesh. It is useless to say that the cow puncher's sweetheart is saved and that the Indians get their deserved punishment.

MAMA'S BIRTHDAY PRESENT.—Mrs. Newlywed is a nervous and excitable woman, always worried when Mr. Newlywed is away from home, and when her birthday approaches an opportunity occurs to her husband to buy a watch dog. He acquires possession of this dog in a very amusing way, has all sorts of trouble in getting it home, more trouble in getting it into the house without being seen, and finally succeeds in hiding it in a small closet under the stairs preparatory to the presentation on the following day. A couple of Mrs. Newlywed's former girl friends happen in to help out in the celebration, and the cook promptly quits. To make matters worse, Mr. Newlywed has a telegraphic summons calling him to the city, and in his rush to get away he forgets all about the dog in the closet, and when night comes on and the three women have retired there is a sudden alarm. Noises are heard like those made by a burglar trying to force open the door. Of course it is the dog trying to scratch his way out of the closet and from time to time the pictures flash to the interior of the closet showing the dog trying to scratch his way out under the door. Naturally the women are in a frenzy of fear, but manage to pluck up sufficient courage to come down to the telephone and call up the police. They soon arrive, and after a great ado round up the supposed burglar just as a telegram comes in from hubby telling mama about her birthday present.

UNREQUITED LOVE.—A Visit to the Country.—Introducing a family party in which the two vivacious and pretty sisters prove of the greatest interest to us.

Which Does He Love?—Under this subtitle we watch an interesting flirtation between the sisters and a youth, who is evidently a close friend of the family.

I Love Your Sister.—Here he unfolds his mind to one of the maidens asking her to intercede with her sister in his behalf. This she does, in spite of her own great love for him.

Will You Sanction Our Engagement?—The parents are visited with the query and express their pleasure at the outcome of the present courtship.

The Wedding.—Staged magnificently and lavishly costumed. This scene proves delightfully entertaining.

I Have Nothing to Live For.—The pathetic side of the drama is now introduced. The jilting of the less fortunate sister in this section is a veritable orgy of dignified pantomime.

A Year Afterwards.—The disappointed maiden has gradually declined until she is become an invalid. The sister and her husband hold a consultation and decide to do her all the kindness to her at all times.

The Flower Fete.—Rest at last.—While the rest of the friends are happily engaged in a dance at the Flower Carnival the invalid girl passes away. To add to the pathos, the happy party on their return thinking she is asleep, covers their friend with flowers.

CALINO TAKES NEW LODGINGS.—[illegible]. With all the awkwardness of the continent on the usual crowd of bumpers and baggage smashers.

Hanging Pictures.—A rather quiet prelude to the numerous "bear tragedy" events which are to follow.

Fixing Shelves.—Offering the comedian a remarkable opportunity to display his utter inability to cope with the easiest situations.

A Little Help.—The aid of all neighbors is enlisted more to radical confusion than to order and aid. The maneuvers of this group are so comic that any audience will be continually surprised as well as amused.

The Chandelier.—The film, which is a satire on the flimsy flat buildings of Paris finally closes by Calino being easily dragged through the ceiling by irate neighbors, who object to his driving nails through their floor in his efforts to hang a chandelier.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

(George Kleine.)

INGRATITUDE.—I Hereby Bequeath.—A fairly wealthy farmer foolishly gives all his effects to his son on the condition that a comfortable living be given him until his death.

Six Months Later.—The son has proven untrue to his trust and developed a fierce cruelty toward his kind but unwise father.

His Only Friend.—But for his sweet natured grandson, the old man would often suffer for the barest necessities of life. The two become great companions.

The Revolutionists.—Incited by a rowdy leader, organize to rob the Royalists of the neighborhood. Word of their progress soon covers the countryside.

The Marquis Tries to Save His Treasure.—A local lord of great wealth hears of their approach and attempts to hide his treasure box, but is frightened into flight before he finishes his task.

Overtaken.—After an exciting chase along the highroad, across fields and through deep forests, he is forced through fatigue to stay his flight.

The Hiding Place.—Seeing capture is inevitable he throws the box of jewels into the bushes.

Found.—Here they are discovered by the old farmer's grandson and given to the abused old man.

The Band of Fanatics Complete Ruin.—Now the revolutionists find excuse to drive the ungrateful man from his home and burn it to the ground.

Forgiven.—In this scene the old man forgets the past and gives his aid to his son who has so ill-treated him.

MILITARY KITE-FLYING AT RHEIMES.—Preparing the Kites.—Showing in detail the extending of the planes by use of jointed frames. For transportation the kites are folded into a very small space.

Sending into the Air.—Even before a kite's sections are entirely joined it begins to tug heavily upon the ropes.

Suspending the Car.—After several powerful kites have been sent into the air upon one line a car is attached, carrying in some cases several men.

The Windlass.—A close view of the large reel which carries the kite-line. Two strong men are required to handle this.

In the Air.—We now follow the kites and cars about and among the clouds for a little time.

The Descent.—Which is accomplished easily and impressed us with the utility of these large toys in the hand of grown men.

G. MELIES.

BASEBALL. THAT'S ALL!!—He's a regular "fan" and studies the baseball news as carefully as some people do their Bibles. He comes to breakfast with his dear little wife and finds his morning paper as usual at his plate. "By Jove!" he shouts, as he glances at the news, "a game this afternoon." Then he begins to wax eloquent about the strikes, flies, home runs and base hits, putting his hand in the hominy, knocking the coffee pot from the table and winding up his exposition by pulling the table cloth off and everything else with it. He has gone the limit and wifey can humor his craze no longer. She swoops down upon him with an umbrella and gets in some "swats" that nearly knock the cover from his dome. He makes a run for the office with a deep laid plan to go to the ball game by pretending he has a toothache. The plan succeeds and he starts for the grounds. Just after he has worked the toothache excuse the boss jacks up the newspaper and the first thing he strikes is [illegible]

PATHE FRERES.

WHO IS BOSS. When Mr. Young [illegible] married he made up his mind that [illegible] the world to the boss in his home. When his wife received a short note from her mother [illegible] her intention of calling upon them [illegible] day Mr. Younghusband saw the time was coming when he would have to set his foot down. The esteemed lady duly arrived, but during [illegible] angry discussion took place, and Mr. Young refused flatly to show that he was the boss. He threw the dinner and furniture out of the window and made his mother-in-law leave the house as she did not seem amenable to reason. He was then able to recline in his chair with his hands in his pockets and say "I am the Boss."

THE GAMBLER'S WIFE. John Darrell had a comfortable home and a charming wife, but was unable to conquer his insatiable desire for gambling. One night, when he and his wife are entertaining three other gentlemen at dinner, a game of cards is proposed and at the earnest solicitation of his wife he promises to play but a short while. Unfortunately, he does not keep his promise but continues to play, and the longer he plays the larger his losses become, until he has lost everything to his friend, Hubert Dickman. Finally as a last resort, to recoup, and against the wishes of his wife, who endeavors to restrain him, he stakes his home against the money he has already lost. Needless to say, he loses. In despair he retires to his room to think things over, reading a letter from his wealthy uncle in which he refuses to help him until he has conquered his passion for gambling. The idea comes to him to rob his uncle. Preparing he sets out suitable clothes and gets out his gun and then, lying on the sofa, falls asleep. But bad dreams come to him—he sees himself arise, disguise himself and enter his uncle's house by the window. He then sees himself taking the money from his uncle's bureau, and being disturbed, shoots and wounds the old man, but he himself is shot and captured. There is then mutual recognition by uncle and nephew, but at this moment he rolls off the sofa horrified, and unable at first to believe that it was only a dream. Meantime Dickman has told Mrs. Darrell that he has won the home and she who never plays determines that she must make an effort to regain the fortune her husband has so recklessly discarded. Staking her jewels against some of the money, she wins, and finally secures, not only all that her husband had lost, but all the ready money that Dickman had on him. Having accomplished her purpose she bids the footman show him out and returns to her husband to tell him of the altered state of affairs. He would fall upon her neck and smother her with kisses, but she tells him that he cannot kiss her until he swears to cease playing for evermore. After a moment's hesitation he takes the required oath, destroys the cards and embraces his wife, feeling sure that he will stick to his promise after the dreadful lesson his dream had given to him.

LUCY AT BOARDING-SCHOOL. Maisie is foremost amongst the girls at boarding-school in exchanging jest and puns over the wall with a number of young boys, one of whom gives her a packet of cigarettes and teaches her to smoke. Maisie is an apt pupil and, delighted with the seeming importance of her cigarette she slips away to offer up incense to my Lady Nicotine in peace and quietness. She smokes like a chimney and a suspicious whiff betrays her whereabouts and her wrongdoing to the headmistress. Maisie then retreats into a cellar room, bolting the door to and holding it fast; but, ogawars, she catches her dress in the door, and it is cut by the headmistress as a means of detecting the culprit later on. Her pupil's first feeling of dismay upon discovering what has happened is quickly followed by the conviction that she must render the evidence against her useless by a politic counter-stroke, and she accordingly cuts a piece out of the dress of each of her school fellows after bedtime. Unluckily, she has omitted to notice that her underskirt has also been damaged, and this betrays her on the following day, when she is rigorously punished.

THE BELGIAN ARMY. Military service in Belgium is compulsory, although part only of the term of service is spent with the colors. Actually the army numbers some 48,000 men, although, with the addition of the reservists, 160,000 men could be taken into the field. Antwerp, where are situated the principal barracks, affords, with its semi-circle of forts and large open spaces on the right bank of the Scheldt, facilities for maneuvers and military training. The Belgian soldier is fairly well set up, is not altogether unenthusiastic regarding his occupation, and, on the whole, the little kingdom's army compares favorably with others of small countries.

THE APPEAL OF THE PRAIRIE.—John Henderson, prospecting in the Far West, is lost on the plains without food or water. Luckily, Lonefox, the young son of the Sioux chief, while riding, finds him and drags him delirious to his father's camp, where attention and care are bestowed on him and he recovers. Before going on his way Henderson gives Lonefox a valuable ring for having saved his life. Fourteen years elapse, and Lonefox has graduated at the Spendex Indian college, while Henderson, having met with great success in life, is now president of a bank in the East. Lonefox, on the strength of a recommendation from the college, obtains a position in the bank, but one day Charles Holstein, to be avenged on Lonefox, who has refused to be a party to certain villainous schemes, places a roll of notes in his pocket. The money is soon missed and Lonefox is denounced as the culprit. Pleading his innocence to Henderson, the latter notices the ring on the Indian's finger and mutual recognitions follow, with the result that Lonefox is acquitted of the crime and taken by Henderson to his home and introduced to his wife and daughter as the man who had saved his life years ago. At a lawn party Lonefox excels in archery, but is mocked for being an Indian by Holstein, who is a suitor for the hand of the daughter. Lonefox is also in love with Elsie, who, when he proposes to her, refers him to her father, knowing full well that he will not permit her to marry an Indian. This, together with the sight of Elsie and Holstein together, excites his Indian blood and he seizes a dagger with the intention of committing a crime. His training at college, however, appeals to his better nature and stops him from this, but the call of race is too strong and, destroying his diploma, he departs back to the West. Here he hunts out his tribe, and is welcomed back by his father, who, wrapping his own blanket around his shoulders, leads him into his tepee to once more revert to the manners and customs of his race.

SELIG POLYSCOPE CO.

THE ROAD TO RICHMOND.—No period in our glorious American history is so endowed with the noble reminiscences of manhood than those memorable days when brother fought brother and shed their life's blood for the cause their conscience told was right. The firing on Ft. Sumpter was the signal that made possible the most fearful war the world has ever known. A half century had plodded by and yet embers of that great struggle still smoulder in the hearts of every brave American, and has served to perpetuate the memory and immortalize those grand old generals—Lee, Grant, Sheridan, Mead, Longstreet, Sherman, Jackson and a score of others while the great event of those stirring days has passed into history. It remained for the redoubtable Selig to put in pictures at an enormous expense this wonderful panorama of human sacrifice and accordingly chose as his title "The Road to Richmond," with Jennie Carrol, sister of Lieut. Carrol, as his heroine. The scenes are all in old Virginia and covering that period from 1860 to 1865.

Pretty Jennie Carrol falls in love with her brother's comrade when her brother brings him home on furlough. They are both officers in Uncle Sam's army prior to the war. When that dread event happens, separation ensues and the meeting of the comrades in battle. The final reunion between the northern soldier and his southern sweetheart form the story interest of this latest Selig war picture. Old in theme truly but told as Selig tells them and it holds the interest from the first.

LED BY LITTLE HANDS.—John Flint, a stern old man, whose life is wrapped up in his beautiful daughter Nellie, has become obvious to any reason other than that she should marry the man of his choosing. A determination that has oft times proven useless interference in love affairs.

Nellie loved Dick Summers, and he in return was happy in the thought of her affection. The day was set and Nellie's dimpled finger bore the little band of gold. The father, indignant at the sudden change of affairs, turns them from his door.

Nine year later we see Dick and Nellie in their modest little home, heaven has blessed them with two devoted children. The smouldering embers of paternal love still gives its light in Nellie's heart and she longs for his love and forgiveness. The children in playful prattle seem to realize the situation, and steal out quietly, bent on finding grandpa.

They do so and come upon him in the garden and after some questions are recognized as his grandchildren. It has been so long since his sturdy heart had been soothed with words of kindness and John Flint saw a new world open to him, rays of sunshine seemed to nestle here and there.

The children stayed for dinner little thinking in their childish glee that their parents were almost distracted at their absence. Nellie finding the boy's cap outside the garden gate feels a relief and ventures in. If is then her eyes for the first time in nine years rest upon her father, but the infuriating process has met its waterloo; the once stony hearted John Flint was humble and craved the love of his girl. He takes her to his heart and home.

The ever prevailing influence of the inner man predominates and ends happily the little romance that found its beginning in blighted ambitions. A picture so real and true to life, so pure in motive and upbuilding in its moral theme cannot but rank well among the season's successes.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

A ROUGH WEATHER COURTSHIP.—The gangplank has been drawn back and the steamer is under way; the passengers are all on deck, among whom is a gay and attractive widow. Her fellow passengers of the male gender are casting furtive and loving glances at her. After some sparring they manage one after the other to make her acquaintance.

So agreeable do they make themselves that she keeps them all on her string, although each one thinks he is the favorite. The Captain is not immune from her charms, and he decides to lay court to her heart, but so infatuated is she with the gallant and attentive passengers that the Captain makes little headway.

A few days later, when the steamer gets well upon the bosom of the deep and the boat begins to roll and rock, the passengers begin to feel seasick, and one by one they succumb to "mal de mer." They are so absorbed in looking over the side of the ship and sustaining their equilibriums they neglect and entirely forget the pretty widow.

They are obliged to seek the recesses of their cabins until the coast is left entirely clear for the Captain, who puts in an appearance and soon engrosses the attention of the lady in weeds, until she finds herself infatuated with his winning and convincing way. By easy stages the man of the mighty deep seizes the helm and lands his fair and graceful sail into port and makes her fast to his every wish, and they are as good as spliced.

When the passengers come on deck and try to regain the lost vantage they gradually realize the lay of the land, and it is a question whether they are not sicker than they were before the Captain made himself master of the lady's hand as well as the master of the ship.

CHEW-CHEW LAND.—Two children, Dolly and Jim are schoolmates. Jim is a manly little chap. One of the boys puts a wad of chewing gum on the teacher's chair. Jim takes a package of chewing gum from his pockets, puts a piece in his mouth, and gives a stick of it to Dolly, who is chewing busily when the teacher sits down on the chair and the gum. All the youngsters begin to titter; the teacher discovers the cause and accuses Dolly of placing the gum on the seat. Dolly denies it, but the "schoolmarm" doesn't believe her. Jim comes forward and says he did it; taking the blame and relieving Dolly from suspicion. Jim is kept in after school, and when he is allowed to go home he meets Dolly outside waiting for him with a bouquet of flowers, which she gives him and commends him for his bravery.

Jim, our little hero, tired out by the duties and play of the day, is getting ready for bed. Placing Dolly's bouquet in a glass on a table, sticking his chewing gum on the bedpost, he gets under the covers and goes to sleep.

During his slumbers "Wriggles," a mischievous imp, gets him to visit "Chew-Chew Land." They jump out of the bedroom window to the garden below, where they meet Dolly. Wriggles touches the ground with his magic wand; it opens and down into the opening the three explorers disappear from sight and drop right-side-up into "Chew-Chew Land," where they are introduced to its mysteries and many wonders, filling them with astonishment and glee. One thing after another appears to awaken their surprise, one thing funnier and more amazing than the other. Jim is puzzled and is just asking himself "How can all these things be?" when he wakes up and realizes that it is all a dream. His mother comes into his room and Jim tells her all about his dream while she is helping him dress, and together they are enjoying all the wonders of "Chew-Chew Land" as they have been revealed to Jim.

HOW SHE WON HIM.—Some possess youth; others good looks, and still others have money, but Muriel Hanson has all three and she is engaged to be married to a fine young man named Arthur Lewis, whose father, supposed to be a wealthy man, dies penniless. The young man is obliged to start out in life as best he can. He does not wish to hold his intended to her betrothal to a poor man, writes her, releasing her to marry some one else if she chooses or wait until he has made a position for himself.

Her uncle, in whom she confides, gives her an idea. She must write Arthur, telling him she has lost her fortune and must go to work as a poor girl to fight life's battle. Then the uncle addresses a letter to the young man, offering him a position with the firm of "Hanson, Hanson & Co." She [illegible] Vitagraph's place in the office, and when Arthur calls in answer to the letter he is surprised to see Muriel working there.

The uncle, Muriel's brother, employs Arthur [illegible] and the young couple feels that the wedding day is not far off. After this an awakening occurs which comes as a great and pleasant surprise to and convinces him and her that [illegible] not a mercenary love for his [illegible] was made when both were poor. The surprise comes to him when he reads that his sweetheart is still an heiress and is made president of the firm of Hanson, Hanson & Co. by the will of her late father.

LUBIN NOTES.

One of the coming Lubin releases will be a seacoast picture made in the same picturesque places which made comment last season, when several seacoast pictures were released. The newest seaside topic will be released in a few weeks and is notable for a clean-cut story as well as picturesque placement of scenes.

The open-air treatment of the White Plague is the theme of one of the Lubin releases of current issue. Those who have seen the advance prints are loud in their praise of the treatment of the story, which is a love story of gripping interest in addition to a forceful argument in favor of the prevention camps. The camp pictures were made at Fairhaven, N. J., where there is located one of the largest tuberculosis camps in the country.

It is not improbable that the vaudeville audiences of the present day will be given opportunity to see the most famous of all the Lubin chases. "Meet Me at the Fountain" is a splendid revival done in the brilliant photography of to-day and played with a finish that was not demanded in the days when this subject was young. In its day "Meet Me at the Fountain" was a sensation, but few of the present-day audiences paid much attention to pictures then, and it would be a real novelty to most audiences.

In this connection the Magnetic Film Service of Cincinnati reports a revival of last year's "A Hot Time in Atlantic City," which is enjoying a new popularity. With a new print and booming by means of the Hennegan & Co. posters, this rapid-action comedy is helping to break records in Ohio houses.

NESTOR FILMS IN ENGLAND.

Nestor films have attained no mean success in the home of John Bull. Western pictures, such as Mr. Horsley produces, are exceedingly popular with our British cousins, and not a week passes that "Dave" does not receive some new standing orders from the "other side," and orders for additional prints are the rule and not the exception. Almost every Nestor release has made a hit across the "pond," but it remained for "A Soldier's Sacrifice," a dyed-in-the-wool American war drama, to create a genuine furore. This proves beyond the shadow of a doubt that the Britons possess a broad mind and a heart that beats in unison with the rest of the world: it also proves that Mr. Horsley has the "real goods" in Nestor films and knows how and when and where to deliver them.

KALEM NOTES.

The Kalem Company's Indian picture for Friday, September 9, is called "The Cow Puncher's Sweetheart," and, as the title indicates, there is more of the cowboy than there is of the Indian. The title part of this story is played by Miss Gene Gauntier, the popular heroine of the Kalem "Girl Spy" series, and in this picture she gives the finest exhibition yet of dare-devil horsemanship. The feature of this picture is the magnificent riding and the beautiful Western horses. The photography is exceptionally brilliant.

In "Mama's Birthday Present," the other Kalem release for this week, they offer a domestic comedy that will appeal with great force to newly wedded couples all over the country. The scene is supposed to be laid in a typical New York suburb, a section more or less infested by tramps. The working of this plot furnishes unlimited opportunities for fun-making and mirth run riot through the film from start to finish.

BUFFALO BILL PICTURES.

Buffalo Bill (Col. Wm. F. Cody), the last of the greatest of American scouts, is bidding good-bye to the amusement-loving world, and no longer will the public be stirred to great enthusiasm by the appearance of his heroic figure, mounted like a modern centaur, upon his beautiful horse. For many years thousands looked forward to his annual tour, and without question the news of his retirement will be received with great sorrow. Col. Cody realized this, and to permit the public to see the greatest Wild West show at any time, has made use of the latest innovation of the theatrical world, the moving picture, and through the offices of the Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill Film Co., the greatest of all Wild West shows, with Indians, cowboys, cowgirls, Mexicans, Cossacks and the many hundred of daring horsemen in their reckless and masterful riding exhibitions, will be shown upon the screens of our moving picture theaters.

THE TEMPTATION OF SAM BOTTLER. This is a drama of the race track, in which a jockey overcomes temptation and rides his mount to victory. The Viscount of Stalnville has entered his thoroughbred "Griffon," in the Derby. He is delighted with the condition of the horse at a practice run, and backs the animal heavily to win. The sporting journals learning of the excellence of the horse predict its winning. Guy, a bookmaker, has plunged stoutly against "Griffon" and fearing disaster sends his friend Pannequin to corrupt Sam Bottler, offering the $10,000 to hold the horse, but the proposition is indignantly refused. That evening Bottler loses $4,000 at baccarat, and is loaned the money by Pannequin. At the race track the Viscount is seen giving his last instructions to the jockey and after his departure Pannequin sneaks into the paddock and proposes that in consideration of excusing the $4,000 debt Bottler lose the race. Bottler, moneyless, accedes to this. The trainer, however, who has overheard the plot, recalls Bottler to a sense of his duty, and he is overcome with remorse. Astride of his horse he makes a sensational ride, winning the race by several lengths. Pannequin, furious at the frustration of his plot, upbraids Bottler, but is expelled from the track. The Viscount handsomely rewards the jockey, who is thus relieved of financial embarrassment.

A TRUE INDIAN BRAVE.—Frontier life was hazardous. Affording, as it did, a safe retreat for criminals of all countries, the honest pioneers were compelled to punish crimes summarily in order to check the recklessness of the desperadoes with which the West was infested. Slight circumstances oft times sent a man to his doom, and in this swift meeting of justice the innocent frequently suffered. This playlet shows the narrow escape of a man and woman from the avenging hands of cowboys who thought them guilty.

Two cowboys who have imbibed freely and unwisely meet a pretty little Indian girl fishing. Bob tries to kiss her while Jack looks on and laughs. The girl struggles with Bob and becoming alarmed at his boisterous attentions strikes him with a large stick. As he falls unconscious to the ground Jack rushes toward her but she holds him at bay with the club. At this moment the girl's Indian sweetheart arrives on the scene and leaps upon the white man who draws a knife. A terrific struggle ensues and the Indian forces the knife against the cowboy, who falls to the ground. The Indians make their escape and Jack staggers to the bar room where a crowd of the boys are, and wildly tells them that Bob is killed and he wounded. The Indians are captured and thrown in jail, but the red man overcomes the jailor, releases the girl and together they flee again. Overtaken once more, the boys are about to deal summarily with their captives when Bob and Jack come up and manfully admit the fault was their own. The lovers are released, Jack holds his wounded arm, Bob rubs his sore head and the vanquished jailor his sore throat, amid the laughs of the crowd.

WESTERN JUSTICE.—The horse is largely responsible for the advance of civilization in America. Upon his sturdy limbs and trusty back depended the life of the hardy pioneers. For this reason the theft of a horse was regarded as a heinous crime, for which capital punishment was but meet.

In this story Beb and Edna indulge in lariat play. She runs away and he casts his rope, pinioning her arms to her side. She laughingly capitulates, and turns her fact expectantly toward him for the kiss which he tenderly bestows. A typical western corral is shown, with the cowboys lassoing and saddling their mounts, after which they ride out on the range. A vagabond arrives, astride of a sorry looking animal, who ropes the best horse at hand and makes away with it. Edna has witnessed the deed, mounts her horse and dashes off to sound the alarm. The cowboys take up the pursuit, the terror-stricken thief using whip and spur to outdistance his avenging pursuers. Nearer and nearer they come, however, and finally a lariat settles over his shoulders and he is jerked to the ground and swift justice meted out. The boys ride gravely back to the ranch where they discuss in hushed tones the unpleasant duty they have been compelled to perform.

AMBROSIO.

THE CAPRICE OF A DAME.— The coquettish impulse of a lady nearly ended a beautiful romance and brought grief to the hearts of a shepherd and his sweetheart. During a festival, in which the simple-minded peasants are seen in gala attire, enjoying themselves with carol and dance, the lady of the manor, with her suite, mingles with her subjects. She is struck with the appearance of a handsome young shepherd, and in a spirit of mischief whispers in his ear asking him to call on her that evening. The simple young fellow is overcome with pride and immediately becomes infatuated with the grand dame. He calls at her castle and is ushered into her presence. She amuses herself with his simple love-making, and he departs obsessed with the idea that he has won her heart. He is thunder-struck the next day upon meeting her to be greeted with a disdainful laugh. Wildly he follows her and demands an explanation. A little remorseful, she throws him a purse of gold, which he passionately throws into the stream, and seeks solace with his flock. He meets his sweetheart whom he had forgotten in his infatuation, weeping bitterly, and realizing his true love for her longs to take her into his arms and comfort her. He fastens a wreath of flowers around the neck of a little lamb and pushes it toward her as a message of love. This pretty little ruse wins her forgiveness, and soon the sorrows of the lovers are forgotten in the sweet consciousness of their manifested affections.

FRICOT HAS LOST HIS COLLAR BUTTON.— Fricot is dressing hastily and cannot find his collar button. In his mad search the furniture and crockery suffers, which arouses the anger of the housekeeper who handles him with no gentle hands. The button is found in a button hole of his collar.

CHAMPION.

A WILD GOOSE CHASE.—Nell Brinkley's mother says she (Nell) shall marry whom she chooses, and Nell's father says she will marry whom he chose. Nell chooses Tom Downey and her mother approves of her selection. But unfortunately her father's choice is William Mason, who Nell dislikes very much. Both young men present her with an engagement ring, but before Bill gets to the house Nell is already wearing the one presented by Tom. Bill makes an awful holler about it to her father and the old man orders Nell to accept Bill's and return Tom's ring. She weepingly returns the one, but positively refuses to accept the other. A violent scene is about to ensue, when Mrs. Brinkley's maiden sister puts in an appearance and for the moment quells the storm. She is accompanied by the parson. Tom and Nell soon corner his reverence and try to persuade him to marry them despite the paternal objections. The parson will not, however, give ear to their protestations. Therefore, through sheer force of necessity, the young couple, aided by the mother, concoct a scheme whereby they hope to outwit the father and the objectionable suitor. Nell writes five letters and with the delivery of them begins a wild goose chase. The parson receives one, asking him to call at the ranch on urgent business. The father gets one, presumably from the parson, requesting his presence at the parsonage at once on an important matter. Bill, the persistent, though unwelcome, lover, also receives a note telling him to hurry to the ranch. Mrs. Brinkley comes in for one, too, telling her to hurry to her husband's aid. The fifth letter reaches the old maid imploring her to come to her sister at once on a very serious matter. The father calls at the parsonage, only to be told by the housekeeper that the parson had been called to the ranch. Bill calls at the ranch in time to see a woman on horseback riding away from the house: thinking it is Nell, he starts after her, fearing she is about to elope. The father, in a furious rage, returns home in time to see a cowboy running after his daughter. He thinks it is Tom and his daughter eloping and he starts in pursuit. In the meantime, Nell, who has loaned her coat to aunty for the occasion, calls in her mother, who has been in hiding, and her brother Jack. Then Tom brings in the parson, who has no alternative but to marry the intrepid young lovers. The runaway trio enter at the finish and glower in helpless fury at the smiling and married youngsters. The poor old maid, seeing how she has been made an unconscious instrument for the accomplishment of the plan, begins to wail about her reputation, and to soothe her and satisfy all concerned, except Bill, the old man makes Bill marry her and the old maid's sadness is changed to joy. This bids fair to be the funniest Western comedy ever put forth in the independent market. You must get it so as to fill a long felt want.

NESTOR

THE MOONSHINER'S DAUGHTER.—"A Revenuer!" The one word that strikes terror to the heart of the moonshiner. So that a stranger who wanders too near the vicinity of the illicit distiller is apt to receive a gentle warning in the form of a bullet that he is on dangerous ground. It was one of these "warnings" that Frank Parmeley had received from the Nelsons, father and Son, when Nance Nelson met him and after satisfying herself that he was not a revenue officer took him to their cabin, dressed his wounds and was about to advise him to profit by the lesson when she became aware of a face in the window. It was that of her sweetheart, Jack Geering, although this she did not learn until he came to her aid in preventing her brother Jim from again firing upon the retreating form of the stranger. As a result of his interference, however, Jack was ordered from the place, but this did not keep him from calling whenever he found the coast clear. Nance would not have had him otherwise, still the young mountaineer's masterful manner of wooing led her to believe he might think her too easily won; and as a consequence, when a few days later he attempted to put his arm about her the girl feigned anger and ran into the house. This piece of coquetry, however, came near turning out rather seriously, for at that moment Frank Parmeley appeared with a book and a box of candy for the young lady, but upon meeting the stern glances of Jack hastily remembered a previous engagement, while Nance, [illegible] angry at his cowardice, threw his present after him. [illegible] to dart [illegible] that Bob Nelson may return to find her again upon his premises and [illegible] allowed to depart with nothing [illegible]. Nance knew from her father's tone that [illegible] be the last. It was small wonder then that she turned pale with excitement when a couple of days later she heard an [illegible] and looking earnestly through the [illegible] and getting their rifles in readiness. As her father passed into the house she managed to slip the gloves from his pocket and as she looked her worst fears were realized. It was Jack coming up the mountain. When her father had loaded a few moments before it had not been Jack but Frank Parmeley in disguise. Ignorant of this Nance stepped to the window stood by her father and with a quick click knocked off the hammer rendering the weapon useless. Then with presence of mind she diverted his attention while she took the revolver from his holster and tossed it into a clump of bushes. And this was very fortunate for Jack, for scarcely had Nance started down the mountain to warn her sweetheart than the valley men came straggling on for seeing the Nelsons' light, although they were powerless to harm one until they could get into the house for other weapons he took to his heels and only stopped to beg protection of the lovers. Being assured that he was not a revenuer and not wishing to see innocent blood shed, Jack commanded the lover-stricken man to lie down while he fired a shot in the air, and as the father and son came hurrying up declared that they had arrived too late. It so pleased the Nelsons that Jack had sided with them that they at once gave him their hands and all enmity was at an end, while Frank, as soon as they were safely out of sight, lost no time in making good his escape.

ECLAIR.

BETWEEN DUTY AND HONOR.—Col. Delort, one of Napoleon's trusted officers, is allowed to retain his office after the Emperor's downfall. He gives a reception to the officials of the new administration and their wives, which reception is attended by the Attorney of the new ruler. The Colonel discovers the latter paying attention to his wife, whom he orders out of the room, and challenges the other to a duel to death, to which the Attorney agrees. Before this duel, the Attorney receives a letter from the King ordering the arrest of Delort for conspiracy. He gives orders to his men, and the Colonel is brought before him. Delort sneeringly accuses the Attorney for cowardice. The insult rankles, and the Attorney signs an order for the release of his antagonist, and meeting him, tells him that he has betrayed his duty by doing so, but that he can now fight him. An impressive scene shows the meeting in the early morning. The first shot wounds the Colonel fatally, and he sinks to the ground, but demands a second shot, and with this, kills his rival. The wife rushes to the spot, to find both men dead.

YANKEE

CAPTURED BY WIRELESS.—The wireless telegraph has proved a boon to civilization in ways not anticipated when first exploited. It has not only overcome space and time, but has been the means of saving lives at sea which otherwise would have added numerous marine disasters to the long list already recorded. But in addition to this it has closed the door of escape to criminals who otherwise might have avoided the punishment of their crime.

From the robber baron to the present day criminal it is a long step, but history proves that the suppression of crime is largely due to the fact that with the progress of the times it is becoming more difficult for the criminal to avoid capture. Thus the wireless telegraph adds another link in the chain that will, let us hope, eventually prevent all crime.

These conditions are what saved an innocent man from suffering shame and imprisonment for a crime which he did not commit and proved the undoing of a misguided fool and the trusting stenographer who accompanied him disguised as a boy.

ATLAS.

ANIMATION POWDERS. Stories of men who devote their lives to inventing means of making others happy are always welcomed by the reading public on account of their rarity.

The forthcoming Atlas release portrays the success of a philanthropic chemist who discovers a wonderful powder which when sprinkled on the person of anyone produced a delightful feeling of exhilaration and animation.

The antics of a large number of people under the influence of the professor's magic powder in the hands of a mischievous youth are laughable in the extreme.

All classes, ages and conditions are treated alike, the results being similar.

The subsequent capture of the youth after his pranks have almost demoralized the entire village and the punishment meted out to him by his victims adds to the humor of the film.

MOTHER. The play deals with Will Allen a country lad, who is unhappy at home owing to the fact that he is a studious little chap, and prefers his books to farmwork, which incurs the displeasure and enmity of his stepfather, a rough and surly farmer, to whom book learning does not appeal. Will runs away from home, and although his mother keeps a light in the window, hoping to guide her boy home, he never returns.

Twenty years later, when the boy has made a place for himself in the world as a successful lawyer, he goes back to the farm, only to find that his little mother, who has been left a widow, has gone away, whither no one knows.

The mother, in the meantime, being left alone in the world, goes to the city and there supports herself by dressmaking. While shopping in a department store she is unjustly accused of shoplifting. The only person who believes in her innocence is a saleslady, who is discharged for her presumption in daring to correct her superiors.

The girl, in her efforts to help the friendless old lady, enlists the aid of Will, whom she knows to be a lawyer of great ability. Will is about to refuse the case, as the drygoods company is a client of his, when the girl describes the lonely old lady, and begs him for the sake of his mother to defend her. Will consents.

Will's clear statement of the case to the judge, together with May's testimony, frees the mother. When her counsel approaches to offer his congratulations, mutual recognition results.

THE DOCTOR'S CARRIAGE.—The picture opens at the home of Prof. Max, a sweet old musician, who finds it hard to support his two motherless daughters, one of whom is blind. The three live together happily, however, and the professor takes great pride in his daughter's musical education. The little one sings, and the blind girl plays beautifully upon the violin. All three live in the hope that they will soon be able to accumulate enough money to consult a celebrated eye specialist concerning Violet's (the blind daughter's) eyes. But sickness and death overtake the poor old professor, and the orphans find themselves penniless and homeless.

They are finally compelled to sing in the streets, and thus eke out a precarious livelihood. While walking through a fashionable residential street one day, the little sister, Marie, sees the sign of the famous doctor in front of his home. She calls her blind sister's attention to it, but the afflicted girl has no hope that the doctor will see penniless patients. Marie, however, thinks differently, and after she has returned home with her sister, unseen by anyone, she slips quietly from the house and returns to the doctor's residence.

She reaches there just in time to see the doctor alight from his carriage and go hastily up the steps. Before she can reach him to speak to him, he has already entered the house, and the servant refuses to allow the ragged little girl to follow him. Unable to secure an interview with the doctor, and gruffly ordered off the premises by the servant, little Marie conceives the idea of hiding in the doctor's carriage, so that when he next enters it she can make her appeal to him. The doctor sets out on his round of visits and after the carriage starts he discovers concealed beneath the lap robe the ragged little girl. She pleads with him not to be angry with her and tells of her sister's affliction. The doctor is at once interested in the case, he goes with her to see Violet, and has the stricken girl taken to a hospital where he operates successfully upon her eyes, restoring her sight.

After the recovery Dr. Grey brings Violet to the attention of some influential women who, realizing her great talent, see that she does not lack professional engagements.

While returning from one of her recitals Dr. Grey offers to give her cover, and while the little sister is asleep in the chair he tells her of his love. She refuses to wed him, as she is engaged. Marie is awakened by the sound of a kiss, and is told that she is to have a big brother.

He [illegible] and [illegible] with [illegible] goat by a [illegible].

The remainder of the picture is taken up with the first visit of the cannibals to the island and we see as an eye-witness of their weird orgies about the fire. The escape of Friday is given in well-known scenic [illegible].

There is a particularly good picture of Crusoe as he sits at dinner surrounded by his many pets in the various which every reader of the story will recall.

A final scene shows Crusoe going to the help of some pearl fishers who have visited the island and being attacked by the natives and who in a [illegible] assist him to escape. Friday, with the parrot and monkey, and then Crusoe himself are seen [illegible] in on the friends and relatives who for so long thought him dead.

FOR THE GIRL'S SAKE. Jim Saunders, a luckless miner, with his sick wife and baby is starving to death when "Pop" Brown, an old plainsman, discovers them. "Pop" gives them shelter and food, but help arrives too late to benefit Mrs. Saunders who departs this life for the unknown. Jim shortly after deserts the tiny mite, leaving her at the mercy of the world, but "Pop" has become greatly attached to the ruddy-faced little girl and decides to adopt her.

Years later the baby, who has grown into a beautiful young woman, is the sweetheart of Dan Thomas, a handsome young sheriff of the county. Dan stops at the house to show her a telegram ordering him to find and arrest a man known as Big Bill, who is wanted for attempting a hold up.

Later the girl, while out riding, sees Big Bill going into the bushes. Through clever strategy she secures Bill's gun and captures him, takes him to her home and then goes for Dan so he may have the honor of arresting the bandit.

Old "Pop" enters and recognizes in the prisoner the father of the girl. Horrified by the thought that the girl should send her father to jail, "Pop" allows Big Bill to escape. When Dan arrives to arrest Saunders "Pop" tells the story to the sheriff, who thoroughly agrees with him that he was justified.

THE TELL TALE PERFUME.—Major Harding, of the United States Army, is commissioned to deliver important despatches to a Cuban general. Mendez, a Spanish spy, plans to get the papers and engages the services of Mme. Cambrone, a noted adventuress. Major Harding's wife, prior to his departure, tenders a dinner to a number of her friends, among whom are Mendez, Madame and her friend, Miss Deane. During the reception Madame arranges to have Miss Deane fall in a pretended faint and during the excitement Madame goes to Harding's library, opens the despatch box and takes the papers. In doing so, however, she allows her handkerchief to drop among the other papers in the box. A peculiar perfume from it scents the remaining papers and box. Later the Major discovers his loss, calls his wife, who immediately recognizes the odor she had noticed on Madame's handkerchief. The Major visits Madame's house, bribes the servant and secrets himself behind the screen. The spy enters and Madame is about to hand over the papers when the Major makes himself known.

A DAY OF PLEASURE. The Jarr family, consisting of Pa, Ma and five little Jarrs, decide to take a picnic in the country and they certainly have one. After arriving in the suburbs, the family is chased by a dog which almost [illegible] them to death. Then Willie, while stealing apples falls

THE TWO DAUGHTERS. Dollars and devotion, wealth and human hearts, have often fought pitched battles. Often the warm heart the harbor of man's affection, has become callous from contact with gold, and as metallic as the fetters [illegible] itself. The sons of Adam, the daughters of Eve are frail and fickle, their emotions more or less futile. And often it comes to pass that one [illegible] a mother's daughter forgets the [illegible] pomp and pride and the lure of the yellow [illegible] have obliterated all other memories. THANHOUSER NOTES.

Mrs. Walters, the popular "old lady" in Thanhouser plays, is the widow of the late George W. Walters, of the Walters Comedy Company, which attained wide reputation through the West and South some years ago, and in which Mrs. Walters played leading roles. Mrs. Walters is a hale and hearty person with more enthusiasm in her work than many half her age. She is every jot as benignant and motherly off-stage as on, and her gentle ways have won her the lasting affection of her associate players.

ATLAS NOTES.

There is no more annoying person than the fat man who snores in public, in church, in the Pullman car, at the theater, in the street car and even in the Turkish bath. The Atlas Company have selected this critter as a theme for a picture and have produced "The Snorer" for a coming release, using for the principal character a famous snorer known to many New Yorkers. There are numerous scenes and situations in the film which show how a man who snores can mar the tranquility and peace of human kind with very little effort. The film is a full reel in length and guaranteed to cure the blues.

YANKEEISMS.

"Judge Ye Not In Haste," the coming Yankee release, tells a beautiful story of love and treachery, each fighting for supremacy. The originality which marks its telling is decidedly novel, many of the situations being ingeniously handled with a view to improving the picture and making it more realistic as a whole. Additions to the Yankee Stock Company are being made weekly, the aim being to maintain the largest acting force in the Independent ranks in order to carry out its new policy of making only large and important productions. Rumor has it that the Yankee Company will enlarge its plant in the near future in order to better handle the constantly increasing business are obliged to enter the home. They are treated kindly and courteously, and shown every hospitality. During the conversation ensuing, the letter from the mother is shown, and the poor girl, frantic with anxiety, rushes to the home of her mother and nurses the invalid until she becomes well. The contrast of their behavior strikes home to the palsied heart of the disdainful, haughty daughter, and she repeats the folly of her mistaken course. There is a reconciliation, a few smiles, a few tears, and contentment.

DEFENDER

COWBOY'S COURTSHIP. Love's trail and the lassoing of a heart generally are unknown quantities to the mind of the cowboy, and usually send dread and foreboding into the otherwise dauntless breast of that species of personage. Frank Brown suddenly discovers that of all the daughters of Eve, only one is the right one, and is confronted with the healthy problem of devising means to make her care for him. Many things had Frank captured, but the capture of a heart had never been rehearsed. He is at a loss to know how to express the burning thoughts to her, and decides to get a book of advice on courtship. With the book open in back of him, he pleads his case with all the ardor the type conveys, when suddenly his fervor is checked. There is an abrupt end to his eloquence. Some of the ranch boys have seen the book and seized it. In his predicament, Frank would much rather have literally followed his guide to love, along with the ranchmen, in preference to standing with gaping mouth, his four thousand and odd number of hands, and the smiling Edna divining all and laughing the gay and merry laugh of youth.

But woman is sweet and tender when she loves and what if she did actually propose to him?

AN ATHLETIC INSTRUCTOR. The Monroe Club of New York erects a magnificent club-house, and faces the important problem of obtaining an athletic instructor. They insert a want ad. in the daily papers, and many are those who read it and apply for the position. Among these is one who is suffering from an open rupture with the money article, and, as luck would have it, is tendered the position. He has no more idea of how to use his dukes than he would know what to do with a dukedom, and in boxing with the club members, is easily bested. When they realize he is an imposter, they playfully pummel him and when they have all had their try at him, he is ejected, having had a lesson in fistic display that any athletic instructor would be proud to administer.

LUX FILMS.

MA-IN-LAW AS A STATUE. Ma in-law again, she comes to disturb peace in the Bennett family, until her son in-law feels inclined to apply his hypnotic powers.

John also tries to imitate the master by trying to hypnotize Mary, his sweetheart. By accident John breaks the statue in the garden. Ma arrives on the scene, storms and chases him into the kitchen. Now for his hypnotic powers. John turns round on her and the spell is cast, but she will not recover and he rushes off to Mr. Bennett.

The two arriving together on the scene, they suggest putting Ma in the place of the broken statue. No sooner said than done. She is rigged up, placed on the pedestal and Mrs. Bennett and her friends are invited to see the new statue. But the daughter recognizes her mother and faints. Jane picks up the watering can and douches poor Ma, who jumps down, fighting right and left. After some time she is calmed and eventually goes off arm in arm, with her daughter and husband.

THE BOBBY'S DREAM.—Patrolman Slober is really an ornament to the force. Upon his beat he cuts a most imposing figure when his ample proportions heave on the slavey's horizon. Of course an officer of the force has many exciting adventures while on duty and our friend Slober is not barred in these little affairs. In fact, from his own version we are led to believe that he is first and foremost in the field. One day Slober takes a day off and gives his attention to the pleasures of the idle. The film proceeds to show the funny things that happened to faithful club. These unusual proceedings perplex and alarm the noble officer and cause his hair to rise most violently. Fortunately for poor Slober he awakes to find that it is the morning after the night before and that this awful occurrence is only a dream. Murmuring "never again" he proceeds with his duties, a wiser, if somewhat sadder man.

OPERA CHAIRS

That Stand the TEST

The hard usage accorded opera chairs makes the selection of a chair of PROVEN QUALITIES essential.

Our Opera Chairs are conceded to be the IDEAL seating, as they are comfortable, permanently noiseless and combined with a distinctive style and excellence that is unequalled.

A Western "Yank"

Exhibitors have demanded we issue another Western Subject, characteristic of past YANKEE quality and perfection. We've been working weeks and weeks on this one, and we know You'll Tender us the Palm of Supremacy when you see it on your screen.

Coming Out on Monday, Sept. 19

THE WHITE SQUAW

Length, Approx., 1,000 Feet

A real, wild and wooly Western Story, interpreted by the entire strength of the YANKEE acting forces, supplemented by a Band of Real Indians, genuine Cowboys and Cowgirls.

Woman's loyalty and the extremes to which she will go to repay a kindness is the theme employed You can readily see wherein the film will touch heart-chords and stimulate tears, aside from its thrilling moments and startling situations. In a word :

IT'S A TYPICAL "YANK"

Such as First Class Exchanges demand and Critical Exhibitors appreciate. If you want to be a "Yankee Boy," make it plain to your Exchange, or tell us.

"Cowboys' Matrimonial Tangle"

A roaring comedy showing the ways of Cupid on the ranch. Two brothers love two sisters, but each of the girls loves the wrong man. The boys try to win their choice for wives and the girls endeavor to captivate their favored ones. The fair damsels win the day by inveigling the swains into a blindfolded double wedding, and though each man thinks at first he got the wrong girl it turns out that he got the right one.

Released Tuesday, Sept. 13th

"For a Western Girl"

Here is action in every foot—thrilling interest in every scene. Elsa rejects Black Jack for Ned, and the unlucky Jack shows his venomous nature. With the aid of hostile Indians he carries Elsa off, and Ned rescues her. The lovers are facing recapture when the cowboys gallop up and in a desperate encounter rout the redskins and give Black Jack his just deserts.

THE ELGIN NATIONAL TROPHY ROAD RACES

Note:— At a private exhibition of this film at the Chicago Athletic Club, August 29, the assembled members of the Chicago Motor Boat and the participants in the different races got on their chairs and wildly applauded the splendid reproduction of this greatest of all races ever held in this or any other country.

175,000 People Saw the Races; 75,000,000 Want to See the Pictures

What the Race Officials Say

HONORARY REFEREE HUNTER (Elgin National Watch Co.):—"I saw the race from the grand stand each day of the contest. After witnessing the pictures I feel that I was a spectator at all times clear around the entire course."

REFEREE BEECROFT: — "The pictures are wonderfully true to life."

STARTER WAGNER:—"The pictures are immense."

CHIEF EXECUTIVE ROOT:—"The moving pictures, besides being of unusual interest, are of practical value to me. I superintended the preparation of the course and the manner in which racing cars are shown rounding the turns tells me exactly what to figure on the next race in constructing corners."

What Participants in the Race Say

MULFORD, winner of Elgin National Trophy:—"It's great to see one's self as others see him. The pictures are magnificent."

LIVINGSTON, winner of Illinois Trophy:—"I did not know the race was so exciting and dangerous until I witnessed the moving pictures."

BUCK, winner Kane County Trophy:—"I have seen the moving pictures of all the auto races but none compare with these."

HEARNE, winner of Fox River Trophy:—"Nothing could be better than perfect. The moving pictures are perfect."

BARNEY OLDFIELD, who has driven the fastest mile ever made by mortal man—133 miles per hour:—"The intense interest, the wild cheering indulged in by guests at the Chicago Athletic Club banquet where the pictures were first shown tells more than I ever could say of their realism. To this let me add that I led in the cheering."

Chicago Daily Tribune—August 30.—.....After the speechmaking had ended, the American Motor Racing Picture Company gave an exhibition of the moving pictures taken during the races. The pictures are among the best ever taken of a road race and show plainly the cars on the turns and straightaway.

WALTER A. BIRMINGHAM of the Inter-Ocean:—After reviewing the moving pictures of the Elgin road races, I do not hesitate to state that they are the best reproduction of a motoring contest I have ever seen.

More Light!!

In the auditorium is the only way to silence the crank who says "the darkened theatres are hotbeds of vice."

More light means proportionately less brilliancy in the picture unless you Use a Solar Screen.

With the Simpson Solar Screen you can turn on the ceiling and side lights and even open the side doors and admit daylight without impairing the brilliancy of the picture. Over a hundred already in use and the owners more than delighted.

The Simpson Solar Screen is a patented combination of a rollable fabric faced with a bright metallic surface. Seventy-five per cent. more light is reflected than with the whitest cloth surface and the Solar Screen brings out the finest details of the picture.

Simpson Solar Screens are carried in stock on rollers in sizes 6 x 8, 8 x 10, 9 x 12, 10 x 12, 11 x 14, 12 x 15 and 14 x 17. Other sizes to order.

Price 50 cents per sq. foot, up to 8 x 10. Larger sizes 75 per sq. foot.

Exclusive territory given to reliable film exchanges. Orders for stock sizes shipped same day as received.

How Not To Do It.

PRO-"KRASTIN"-ATION EXPOSED.

"I am inviting criticism, and I expect it." Thus speaketh Arnold Krastin, of 205 Main street, Toledo, Ohio. Krastin's invitation was, to say the least of it, hazardous, if not foolhardy, and he probably did not expect that his expectation would be realized on this page—the front page of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD. Frankly, we would like to have disappointed those expectations, because, as every reader of the THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD knows, we have a sympathetic attitude towards all men. We would not willingly hurt a fly, let alone Krastin or any other man. But Krastin, after several perusals of the booklet which forms the text of this article, leaves us no alternative but to accept his invitation and to criticise him. We propose to criticise him strictly according to the facts—his own facts, of which he, himself, said Arnold Krastin, is the originator, the sponsor, and the progenitor.

There is a well-known saying, which being expressed in the current vernacular runs as follows: "Every d—— fool things he can edit a newspaper, command a battleship, run a theater or drive a locomotive." All these things, as we have said before, look absurdly easy. They look so easy that only the d—— fool thinks that he can do the work. Now, to this quartette of phenomenally easy jobs, we add that of "and also thinks he can run a moving picture theater." There are countless thousands in this country and other parts of the world who think they can successfully run a moving picture theater on a limited amount of brains, knowledge and money, and make a good thing out of it. There are probably at this moment scores of thousands, maybe hundreds of thousands of such fools, and it is to this large clientele that Arnold Krastin, "Builder of Moving Picture Theaters," is obviously appealing in the little green covered pamphlet of eight pages that we are holding in our hands at this moment.

According to the prophet Krastin, "it is the easiest thing in the world to secure with the least possible investment . . . the best paying business of to-day, i. e., a motion picture theater." Then Krastin goes on to say how it is done. For $425 he will equip a suitable store room with 150 folding opera chairs, etc., etc., etc., meaning the whole outfit. For $475 this gentleman will also incline the floor. For $525 he does something more; for $600 and $700, still something more. Says he, "bear in mind that for the prices quoted I complete all theaters ready for operation." Krastin is a genius in telling how simply the thing is done.

"How much," asks Krastin, on page six of this momentous pamphlet, "does it cost to operate a moving picture theater?" "It all depends," he says. He tells us one thing: "That you can get an operator for $10, a piano player for $10, film service for $25, a ticket taker for $3 a week," etc. This is the "medium" service. He also tells us that in some States, operators cannot be had for less than $15 per week. To come to the point of this pronouncement, he asks the reader of it to pay him $250 for which he will build you a theater, then he will lease you the equipment for 10 per cent. of the box receipts, then, if at the end of a certain time, you wish to buy this theater, he will sell it to you for 25 per cent. of the weekly box receipts.

This little green covered pamphlet is called "The Cost of Starting a Moving Picture Theater." We do not know how or where it circulates, but we expect that it reaches the general public through the general press. It appeals to the ignoramus. It is the ignoramus that Arnold Krastin, of 205 Main street, Toledo, Ohio, is appealing to. We ask every reader of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD to bear in mind the name mentioned and the address, and to warn all their friends against having anything to do with this man Krastin. He is clearly out for the sucker. The sucker whom he obviously wishes to delude into the belief that it is an easy thing and an inexpensive thing to start a moving picture theater in this year of grace 1910 and make money out of it. It is not. Arnold Krastin, who, on the first page of his green covered manual of deceit, says "that the motion picture theater presents the best opportunity of the day to the small investor, as well as the capitalist," is as much guilty of attempted deception as any Wall Street bucket shop keeper.

The proper conduct of a moving picture theater today is as serious a business proposition as any other business venture now before the community. It demands capital, brains, energy, resource and, above all things, from day to day, from hour to hour, attention to detail, which all successful businesses necessitate. Three years ago such a pamphlet as this might have had some chance of success. It has none, we hope, today, when the public and the trade are alive to the necessities, nay the exigencies, of the moving picture position. The moving picture theater is quite comparable commercially, artistically and in other respects, to any other first class house of entertainment such as a concert hall, talking theater, or even an opera house. It has to be conducted on straight business lines with full responsibility to the needs and requirements of the public. Just as in the ordinary theatrical, concert and opera fields, there is no room for persons of the Krastin type, so we beg to inform him that there is no room for him in the moving picture field. So, Adieu, Mr. Krastin!

Those Who Know Demand the Best.

The above saying is now very commonly used as a commercial advertisement in many of the street cars in New York City. The old saying, "Knowledge is power," is now amplified with this addition that knowledge is choice. Ignorance accepts anything, whether "where ignorance is bliss it is folly to be wise" is absolutely true or not, it is positively distasteful in the midst of knowledge. True knowledge is hungry and must be fed, and grows like that upon which it feeds; hence, education is the greatest principle of the days in which we live. "A little knowledge is a dangerous thing," says one proverb. Yes, where being so little it is misapplied; but a wise continuance in, and development of, true knowledge vindicates its reputation that it gives "power" and also wisdom to choose.

Therefore do the worldly wise, astute, far-sighted commercialists advertise that knowldege gives discernment, enabling the one who knows to demand the best. To be given the best is the demand of those who know in every sphere of life; that "power" which is able to "choose" is everywhere asserting itself, but nowhere more happily than in the world of moving pictures.

The worldwide recognition now given to the value of the living picture has created a demand for its best possible results; very often people are slow in taking knowledge of anything new, yet, be it said to their credit, that when they, through proof, know its value they demand its best.

Many recent events have centered universal attention upon the results of living picture events. The use of the worst by the ignorant brought into strange prominence the jeopardy in which the best was placed, leading to the rescue and reclaimation of the kinematograph from the "halls of shame" and "haunts of vice" into which those possessing that dangerous "little knowledge" had taken it; the large number of these places now closed and either boarded up or falling into decay testify to the fact that people are beginning to know the best and despise the worst; truly these are times in which ignorance is short lived. This new demand is going to be universally beneficial, the best machines are asked for with the best possible result in pictures; a knowing public is very critical, yet not supercillious or overbearingly so, they simply seek the best; and further, to their credit, they are willing to pay for it.

To those holding much power in the moving picture business we would say in coining a new phrase, "Those who know will give the best," thus causing the "demand" to be met with a suitable response from the "supply." Opportunities are ripe and numerous and the world is alert and expectant. In some places loud protestations of what is not wanted may very readily be interpreted to show what will be acceptable as the negative produces the positive with its opposite lights. Quick to learn value, the moving pictures have been accepted at once as of commercial, amusing and educational importance, taking leaps and bounds into prominence, rendering valuable service wherever used. Its value and adaptability is known and it now behooves all interested in every branch of the moving picture work to be assured that it is a truism that:

Charles Urban in New York.

As irrepressible and buoyant as ever, Charles Urban hobbled into this office one day this week on crutches determined, in his own words, to "cheat the doctor." It seems that in crossing the Atlantic on the "Celtic," he slipped on the deck, strained the tendons of the left foot and thus was crippled for most of the voyage. He was in great pain when he arrived at the Knickerbocker Hotel, New York, last Sunday, but for all that he was determined to be out and about. There is no downing the volatile Charles! Consequently, we were not surprised and we certainly were pleased, when, on Wednesday last, he hobbled into our offices, looking, but for his accident, the picture of bodily health. Mr. Urban will have quite recovered the effects of this accident in a few days.

Briefly: Charles Urban is here on a few weeks vacation which he is fairly entitled to enjoy, after fourteen years' steady devotion to the business of moving picture making. It is not fourteen years since we first met him in London, it is round about ten. Whatever other criticisms we may have felt it our duty, both in England and in the United States, to direct towards Mr. Urban and his color process, we have nothing but admiration for his constant devotion to the picture and its making. We can recall many instances in London when we sought to divert Urban's mind into channels having no relation to those of the picture. His retort was: "This has nothing to do with moving pictures, T. B. I live for their making and exploitation."

Besides being present in this country on holiday and family affairs, Mr. Urban proposes devoting some time to supervising the completion of the Kinemacolor plant at Allentown, Pa. Kinemacolor, as we have already told the reader, has been successfully shown in Philadelphia. We hear, too, that in Pittsburg it scored a success. We hope that in the near future it will be adequately presented to the New York public.

It is a curious circumstance that some of the most beautiful moving pictures in the world bear Charles Urban's name and yet Urban himself is not associated with the companies that produce those pictures. He seems to have preferred to depart from the business of straight picture making to promulgating his pet scheme of Kinemacolor. But even so, we suggested to him that it would not be half a bad idea if he returned to his native country to make straight pictures of American subjects in the United States. There is clearly room here for a man of his great knowledge, ability and abiding faith in the future of the picture. What Mr. Urban's reply was, we are not at liberty to state, but we should not be surprised if our suggestion was ultimately acted upon.

Our visitor, whom we desire cordially to welcome here, also outlined many other plans for the future popularization of the picture. These we will refer to in due course. Meanwhile, we are sure that his many friends in this country will wish him speedy recovery from his accident.

Internationalism and the Picture.

Sometime this fall, a series of Spanish made pictures is to be placed on this market. Already one or two subjects have been shown in New York City, but having been pronounced unsuitable for this public they were not released. Nevertheless, we understand that the Spanish manufacturers are determined to adapt their pictures to the taste of the American public, and in due course, therefore, we may expect to see the pictures on public exhibition.

It is evident to our mind that the national spirit in picture making is manifesting itself just as it does in everything else. Throughout this country the cry is, and has been for some time, for American made pictures of American subjects, a very fine sentiment to encourage. But it is clear that the idea cannot be pushed to extremes, to the exclusion of non-American subjects; otherwise you would have a large proportion of the population of the country uncatered for in moving pictures. Nominally American, the United States is without doubt the most cosmopolitan country in the world. Here you have, besides native Americans, enormous numbers of other peoples in process of Americanization: French, Germans, Italians, Russians, Swedes, Austrians, and other European nationalities in large numbers. We leave out of consideration Anglo-Saxon people undergoing the same process. They come from the same stock as the Americans and do not strictly belong to the "foreign" population of the country.

It is clear that all these great Latin, German, Scandinavian, Slavonic and other peoples, for such they are, constitute so many great publics for moving pictures made specially to appeal to them. Hence we think there will always be a demand for such pictures in this country, though it does not appear that there is yet in existence any commercial machinery for adequately supplying that demand. "American subjects for the American people," therefore, is a doctrine that leaves out of consideration the picture needs of probably one-third of the population of this cosmopolitan country, which will not be thoroughly "Americanized" in the accepted meaning of the term, during the life of anybody now living.

This process of the nationalization of the picture is unquestionably proceeding rapidly. For example: the United States Consul at Salonika, Turkey, tells us that the picture is quite a craze there. Italian and French films are popular with the Turks, the American films having superseded. Italy and France are closer to Turkey than is modern America; any traveler will tell you this. The logical outcome of the matter is, of course, that Turkey will soon be making its own pictures, just as Spain, France, Italy, Germany, Austria and other countries are doing. Even far-off Australia, which at present mainly exists on American-made pictures, will also probably make its own pictures before long.

The nationalization and internationalization of the moving picture is inevitable. All civilized countries on the earth to-day are represented by their own schools of artistic expression: pictorial, musical and the like, responding to national life, traits and characteristics. Japanese art is entirely distinct from American art; Russian art is in a class by itself, and so on down the list of the nations.

The enormous, the amazing vogue of the picture, has suggested these reflections to us. Here in New York we of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD are probably in a better position than anybody else in the world to take cognizance of the outlook, and forecast the probabilities of the future. The nationalization and internationalization of the moving picture is one of these. Frankly, we like this outlook. Competition is the soul of trade and when nations start competing with and emulating each other in the production of the picture, then, nothing but good to the moving picture as an international method of graphic and pictorial expression can result.

A New Feature.

The Essanay name contest has closed; while waiting for the outcome the outlook arises before us. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD desires a newer, larger, brighter future. May the new name bring it. Will the new name bring it? The moving pictures are now an established means of amusement, nothing can turn them back again. They have been thoroughly tested and approved; they have passed through both the "craze" and the "crazy" stage and become nationally popular.

Not a thought is interjected here as to their mission outside of the "theater" world; that is for another time and place. We wish to bespeak a larger place for them in their proper sphere as the universal people's entertainment. Give them more and better room in the hands of the most efficient artists and producers of the day they deserve and demand larger and better conditions.

The renting of an old store, or building a shack, must pass away. "Houses," yes even "palaces," must take their place. The profession must supplant the uneducated, mechanical human instrument in charge; people of culture must be the caterers for the public taste.

The cosmopolitan, many named, many tongued, cheap, tawdry apology of that which is too good to be so defamed, is now drawing to an end.

Let the dead past bury the dead and the new life of the future be one of character and fame. It is bound to come, the evolution is now in process. Will the new name be a move forward? W. H. J.

The Pointer.

As it so fully re-echoes our own opinion and that of many other picture fans we print as a pointer to "the pointer" the following extract from an exhibitor's letter:

"I wish you would suggest to the manufacturer that it is time to eliminate the pointing habit. Why, oh! why is it necessary for the actor, every time he goes forth, to stick out his arm and point the index finger in the direction he is going? If he goes up or down, sidewise or otherwise, out goes the pointer. I have had some experience with and appreciate this pointing propensity in a certain member of the canine family; but, Mr. Manufacturer, cut it out of the picture as it stamps the production at once as amateurish if not ridiculous."

Art Versus Avarice.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

No wonder we are scared silly by mere mention of the word "art"; not one man in ten can define it. Whisper "dramatic art" and a panic will ensue. Who has more than a vague idea what "dramatic" means?

I could obtain no satisfactory information on the subject from alleged authorities—they skipped it; so I read plays and drew inferences, read all I could find and saw some of them; then I added them up. Here is the primitive result:

Rostand gives us poetic types struggling to accomplish the unattainable.

Pinero typifies human experience for some reason not apparent to me.

Maeterlinck depicts truth as he recognizes it, showing humanity's destiny.

Shaw presents an idea to show the real underlying the superficial.

Sudermann portrays the clash of humanity's discordant elements.

Hauptmann shows human revolt and resignation in collision.

There are several kinds of composite definitions to be made, each man to his choice. I am to blame for this one. That is "dramatic" which depicts human action truthfully in a play, particularly in enforcing an idea by a conflict of humanity's discordant elements and emotions. I see trouble coming. That definition is given by no authority; but there is positive distress waiting behind the corner when I add one to the thousand significations of the word "art."

Art truthfully expresses whatever is beautiful or practical. "Practical" does not seem to fit in there, but art seems to teach a lesson through reproduction, in perfection of design and execution. There are material reasons for adhering to high standards.

The desire to do well is strong in most men, but that desire splits on a point of material advantage. Some men are enabled to act in accordance with what is best in their natures, their hearts instinctively respond to the universal affections of humanity. Men of that kind came here a century or two ago and transformed a wilderness into what they supposed would be the home of the oppressed, the abode of human freedom, but cupidity is one of the most active of human instincts, it is a strong animal desire, this longing to possess what belongs to another, and it persisted, particularly among those of defective education. It was no longer a question of providing for wife and children, but a sordid and overmastering desire to get the money, no matter how, get it.

Avarice is the distinguishing characteristic of the "wise guy."

Now the benefactors of our race earned their claims to distinction by making our lives better worth living, through comforts presented by the highest forms of mechanical invention, through developments in the history of science, literature, or some form of individual achievement which lifts humanity an infinitesimal fraction in its evolution. They stand for something. Does it pay?

Name any great maker of art objects who has not been rewarded because of the perfection of his designs, because of skill, proficiency and artistic performance.

It seems to me that the making of motion pictures should be taken from the ranks of a temporary expedient for getting all the fruit in sight and raised to the dignity of a permanent art, of recognized beauty and benefit, with no injury to ultimate returns. Perhaps I am wrong. Perhaps the people who attend picture shows to-day will grow weary of that form of amusement, empty ten thousand theaters now devoted to that kind of entertainment, and turn to some better expression of the dramatic art. It is not impossible that they will, but love of that art is deep-seated in the human breast. We love its stimulus.

One of the prettiest motives is the self-struggle going on within all of us; then there is the struggle of art to enforce itself in our daily lives, stirring our aspirations for individual and home betterment. Simple home life had better be depicted than invaded with what is demoralizing and degrading. The normal course of true love furnishes a theme of endless variety. The tragedies and the incongruities of present existence furnish pathos and humor without limit; even the small inconsistencies of the pictured performances, due to some oversight, excite no end of amusement. Motion pictures have come to stay.

The more important the theme of a play, the wider the appeal. Perhaps the strongest of all is an adequate portrayal of our failure to attain our ideals. Plays showing the defeat of our best purposes are not readily understood by those who exercise the power of selection, their own powers are limited by the confinement of one personal experience; they are apt to judge by comparison.

Original plays bear the well-marked stamp of individuality; they may have constructive defects, then the original writer is liable to bump up against theatrical traditions. He derives his materials from observation and reflection and often produces a product beyond the scope of ordinary reasoning power, but such plays have a higher value by virtue of the very quality which condemns them in the eyes of the professional reader. Such plays should be tried. The public is the ultimate judge of their truth, especially when they pertain to actual every-day conditions, about which the reader does not care, in which the general public is deeply interested.

The process by which a man concentrates what is best in him on literary or dramatic compositions involves a selection and arrangement of ideas subsequently welded in a continuity of interest, and requiring highly trained faculties of the mind.

Play-writing is an art. The play is one of the prime essentials in the production of high-class motion pictures. How much is being done to foster that art, to bring forth the best efforts of the playwrights?

Newspapers in large cities are offering prizes amounting to thousands of dollars for plays. Publishers are offering prizes aggregating tens of thousands for short stories. Leading periodicals pay five cents a word for short stories, give a decision in three or four days from the time MSS. are submitted and pay promptly on acceptance. I am not talking to all producers, but I am addressing quite a number. How many houses have paid a single playwright as much as the lowest salaried man on their list? How many have bought enough from a single author to pay for his expenses in submitting scenarios? I share the general impression that the future of the business will depend somewhat upon the quality of the play produced; I have appreciated and encouraged much that is good, contributing in a small way to the general good, and I have that in view in every article I have written, this one included.

"Our Lady of the Snows" on the Screen.

EDISON COMPANY'S SPLENDID SERIES OF WESTERN-CANADIAN SUBJECTS.

The Palace Theater, London, was crowded one afternoon some years ago when we were the guest of Charles Urban (now present in this city) to witness a unique collection of moving pictures. These illustrated Canadian life and industry; farm life; salmon spearing; the lumber trade, etc. They showed very graphically the vast resources of Canada to the immigrant willing to work and, in the words of Abraham Lincoln, "tickle the ground with a hoe." On that memorable afternoon amongst those present were the Duke and Duchess of Argyll, formerly Governor-General of Canada and his wife, and the great figure of Lord Strathcona, British High Commissioner for Canada, who did so much for the development of the Dominion by his work in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. These pictures were genuinely educational, for they were, and are, instrumental in attracting thousands of settlers from the Old World to Canada.

In a sense, history seems to be repeating itself. The other day when we passed several hours in the Edison studio, up in the Bronx, inspecting some pictures, amongst our fellow guests was J. S. Dennis, of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, Calgary, Alberta, Canada. During the past Summer the Edison Company, with wonderful enterprise, sent one of their stock companies into Western Canada on a picture-making expedition. The company traversed the 2,000 odd miles with a two-fold object. Firstly, that of securing pictures of typical Canadian scenery; secondly, that of enacting against these Canadian backgrounds typical Canadian stories, especially prepared. The officials of the Canadian Pacific, with J. S. Dennis at their head, very generously co-operated with the Edison Company in its enterprise. Hotels, trains, mountain guides, yea, even a 10,000-ton oceangoing steamship, were placed at the disposal of the Edison Company and their producers and acting staff, for the purpose of the making of these pictures.

It was this series of Canadian pictures, some eight or ten in all, which will be released at intervals during the present Fall, that we had a special opportunity of witnessing. Adequately to convey our impressions of what we saw is a somewhat difficult task. But in the very beginning we are bound to record our admiration of the wonderful enterprise of the Edison Company in attracting and successfully attacking an adventure of this nature. The cost must have been very great, and the work clearly arduous. But the results justified everything and both the Edison Company and the Canadian Pacific officials deserve to be warmly commended for what was done. For one thing, these pictures will show the moving picture public throughout the world what a wonderful place this young Canada is.

It was Rudyard Kipling, of course, who called Canada "Our Lady of the Snows." Canadians, we are told, do not altogether like the title. Why, we cannot quite understand. There the snows are. In other words, round about Calgary, to our wonderment and surprise, are the beautiful Canadian Alps which seem to vie in scenic splendor with the Swiss and Austrian Alps. You have lofty snow mountains, great snow fields, glaciers, crevasses, Swiss-looking chalets, Swiss guides and beautiful hotels. You can have all the Alpine adventure that you want in Canada. You can recover from consumption there. You can get lost. You can break your neck. So why go to Europe to do these things? The Canadian Alps figure in some of these pictures and very beautiful pictures they are, having an infinite delicacy of tone rendering. Indeed, the Edison people have made some of the most satisfying moving picture photographs we have ever seen in these Canadian subjects. Their delicacy of tone rendering, their fidelity to nature are simply remarkable. As we are insisting week by week upon the importance of pictorial quality in the moving picture, we are specially glad to find the Edison Company conforming to the stand we are taking for pictorial excellence in the picture.

The individual pictures, as they are released, will be noticed in due course in the pages of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD. Our present object is to treat the subject in a general way and give the reader a comprehensive idea of what is in store for him. For example: In one of the pictures you see the life led by that fine body of men, the Northwestern Mounted Police. Around their doings a pathetic story is woven. Then, again, in another picture, you have views of the Canadian Alps; life on Canadian trains; life on a Canadian steamship; you have farm life, domestic life, outdoor life, sporting life. Around each and every one of these phases of life a story is woven by the Edison actors and actresses—anon pathetic, anon humorous, anon sentimental. All the local color is there, all the territorial idiosyncrasies of the Dominion are there. It is all, in fact, Canada on the moving picture screen. We shouldn't be a bit surprised if these beautiful pictures did not largely attract immigrants from the United States into Canada; a process that is going on all the time and will largely, one day not far distant, bring about some interesting political developments. But sufficient for the evil is the day thereof.

Incidentally, we learn that the Canadian Pacific Railroad employs its own moving picture making staff for the purpose of illustrating the industrial advantages of the territory which this great railroad traverses. Then, again, in the British Isles at this moment there are no less than nine peripatetic lecturers employed by the Canadian Pacific Railroad to demonstrate by moving pictures what Lord Strathcona successfully demonstrated years ago, namely the limitless agricultural resources of Canada. We desire to put on record the very effective use which the Canadian Pacific Railroad is making of the moving picture.

Meanwhile, of course, chiefest praise is due the Edison Company for the wonderful success of their experiment. This is a splendid series of photographs. Producers, actors and actresses worked splendidly in Western Canada with a result that they have produced a splendid series of pictures—splendid in photography, splendidly simple and natural in theme. Anybody can understand these stories. At one of them, a comedy, we laughed so much that our cheeks ached. We are going to tell the story of this comedy in our next week's issue. Meanwhile our best congratulations to the Edison Company on their magnificent Canadian work.

Turning over the pages of a recent issue of our Italian contemporary, "La Cinematografia Italiana ed Estera," we find a reference to Miss Frieda Klug who recently passed several months in the United States. Miss Klug is quoted as expressing no particular satisfaction with her moving picture experiences in this country. We understand Miss Klug has started in business for herself in Turin, and we are sure that her many friends in this country will wish her success in her venture.

A Casual Visit to the Vitagraph Plant.

By Wm. H. Jackson.

Having become impressed with the high standard and uniform good work of the Vitagraph productions it became a natural desire for the writer to visit the place whence the pictures came, to know something of the surroundings; also to become acquainted with those in charge, upon whom rested the responsibility of catering for a generous yet discriminating public.

Upon arriving with a friend at the factory on the outskirts of Flatbush, L. I., an "off day" proved disappointing, a large portion of the force being in the country taking special pictures, while those at home were resting from one period of strenuous activity in preparation for another. Scattered about the yard were objects one would expect to see on a battle-field, and I learned that the company had only the day previous finished a big military production bearing the title of "The Sepoy's Wife."

Of the executive heads, Mr. Albert E. Smith was the only one present, and he received us most courteously, and I can say that "nothing was hid from our eyes." The whole place, both indoors and outdoors, is well equipped for the purposes of its use; artists were at work upon elaborate sceneries, mechanicians of varied types, yet of certain ability, together with actors and actresses make up a goodly number of persons in what is proving to be a great professional and industrial enterprise. The film room provides a most congenial occupation for a number of girls and young women who seemed to enjoy their work in pleasant surroundings, impressing the visitor with feelings of satisfaction, that this branch of service had opened up new and clean opportunity for many to earn a good living, free from many objectionable features of factory life.

I was pleased also to note the esprit du corps existing among the denizens of the Vitagraph village. This and the fact that each one I talked to seemed to feel that upon him or her depended the success of Vitagraph pictures, revealed a spirit of loyalty which is essential to the conduct or further expansion of any large business.

It was intensely interesting to be made acquainted with some of the new subjects in the course of preparation, many of which may not reach the public view for several months; so far ahead is the Vitagraph staff with its productions. Two of these new subjects—"Two Waifs and a Stray" and "Adopted Parents," as at present named—were in a sufficiently advanced stage to be shown upon the screen, and, favored with this special yet premature view, they proved to be of true Vitagraph character—interesting in conception, clever in working and perfect in detail. Taking the liberty to study the personnel of the Vitagraph establishment, it was easy to see that with men of thought like Mr. Smith, and others of intense vitalizing activity like Mr. Thompson, one of the directors or producers, it is not surprising that this company is making conspicuous headway. I had quite a chat with Mr. Thompson and learned, by the way, that he was the son of a minister. At all events, he impressed me as being eminently fitted for his present vocation, bubbling over with enthusiasm and in love with his work.

Purposing again at no distant date to visit Vitagraph when the whole company is present and in fullest activity, it will be a pleasure for me to give a further description of one of the leading American moving picture makers. In further justice to this company it also should be recorded that while American in thought and purpose, its productions extend everywhere where moving pictures are used, through English, European and Continental agencies, holding its own with the best foreign makers.

NOTABLE IMPROVEMENTS.

'Twas a sultry afternoon in August, the "slack" month of the year; everyone does as little work and uses as little energy as possible in this negative manner of "working hard to keep cool."

Strolling up Fourteenth street, the "cool reception" offered by Keith's together with the ever-ready desire to see the new "releases," was sufficiently tempting to sit for an hour and enjoy this offered "siesta." Little did I anticipate the several surprises in store for me. Did I not say I would "sit for an hour"? How could I, no matter how tired, when "standing room only" was at a premium? Have the moving pictures become so popular that a hot afternoon does not restrict the crowds? It was certainly the case here, for not until a large number of people had vacated their seats was it possible to sit down for the anticipated rest.

The next surprise was in the pictures themselves. Surely never were better or clearer pictures, as testified to by a most appreciative audience. "Wilful Peggy" proved the irresistible piece, cleverly acted and suitably presented in every way, being warmly applauded at the close.

Here the writer wishes to ask a question and make a suggestion: Why, when a play is so well received, do not the artists "appear before the curtain and bow their acknowledgements"? Surely it would be an easy matter to have such a scene in readiness at the end of good play films; besides which, if the audience knew that their applause would be thus acknowledged, they would be more generous and the result would be more real and lifelike. Let us look for such a valuable addition. The "Anarchistic Grip" and the "Dream Pill" are clean, wholesome, amusing plays, especially if genuine hearty laughter is a token of appreciation.

A series of pictures illustrating the "Pilgrims Memorial Monument" from the foundation stone laying by President Roosevelt to the dedication by President Taft, proved very interesting, the descriptive readings being very intelligently given by a good reader whose voice was audible in every part of the building.

Of the vaudeville it was a pleasant surprise to note the decided improvement. Evidently the criticisms of faults, with suggestions for improvement, made after a former visit to this theater, have proved not only effective but beneficial, so that it becomes a pleasure to point them out. The strange incongruities have been overcome and a very evenly balanced presentation is made, making the whole entertainment extremely satisfactory under the circumstances.

The moving pictures were, of course, the chief attraction. They filled every expectation and without doubt have shown a tendency to elevate the other parts of the program. It is a pleasure to mark these notable improvements.

A CASUAL VISITOR.

Just how much an attractive theater front and fittings will add to the patronage of the moving picture theaters we are not prepared to state. Every manager appreciates the fact however, that an inviting exterior and entrance is a valuable asset and goes far towards success. The Newman Manufacturing Company, of Cincinnati, one of the largest manufacturers in the world, have established a department in their large factory for the production of brass easels, brass poster frames, brass railings, box office wickets, illuminated and electric signs. They are having quite a demand for fixtures from moving picture theaters throughout the country and in Canada and will be pleased to forward particulars to theater managers and owners on request. It is a source of increasing satisfaction to The Moving Picture World to note that much better taste and neater and more artistic ideas are being shown in most of the newer moving picture houses that are now being fitted up. We believe this will undoubtedly result in better business and a more favorable public sentiment towards the "poor man's theater."

Markt & Co., of London, send us a very interesting idea in the way of a film calendar. Markt & Co., we may say, are the London agents for Biograph, Selig and Lubin pictures, and on the calendar sent, they indicate the days on which these pictures are to be released, together with their titles, descriptions and lengths. The idea is worth imitating. We have to thank the same company for sending us copies of London papers containing an appreciation of Biograph pictures; also an article commenting upon the comparative innocousness of the Jeffries-Johnson pictures. These, it seems, did not very much alarm the British public. One writer says: "The original fight may have been demoralizing. As for the pictures, I have been more demoralized by attending a charity bazaar."

Leon Ardouin, formerly chemist of Pathe Freres, at Bound Brook, N. J., is now employed in the same capacity by the Carleton Motion Picture Co.

The comparatively mild weather that prevailed during most of the month of August was responsible for the almost unanimous opinion that with the arrival of Labor Day the picture houses at the Summer resorts would close in large numbers and the city places would be proportionately opened with good business. The day immediately succeeding the holiday inaugurated a spell of heat that equalled any record of the Summer, and all expectations of triumphant reopenings in the cities fell. A majority of the places have reopened; in fact, few of those that closed when the Summer season got started are now closed; but business has not been encouraging. The excessive hot weather has been a severe handicap. The prevailing questions now are, "How long will this last?" and "Are we to have July and August weather in September and October?" It seems safe to give an affirmative answer to the latter question. Most of the people who have not reopened their places are seriously considering the advisability of keeping them closed for the balance of September. As but one week of the month has elapsed, there is time enough for people entertaining such ideas to change their minds. The film exchange men size up the situation quite differently than most exhibitors. I find that none of them have decreased their orders for new films and I know of some exchanges that are preparing to increase their orders from thirty to fifty per cent. after the middle of September. I take these facts as being the most reliable in estimating the outlook for the present month.

I was taken to task the other evening for expressing the opinion that reports from film exchanges were more reliable in making predictions on the outlook for the moving picture business than those received from exhibitors. The party who took issue with me contended that the exhibitors are the best judges because the box offices are the best thermometers. At first thought this seems very plausible, and for certain purposes the contention is well founded, but it really applies to present conditions and not to the future. The receipts of a house kept open all Summer cannot be used in supporting a prediction as to what the house will do in the Fall and Winter, except from one point of view. If the place is not one that is only good for Summer business and its receipts are good during the Summer season, it is a certainty that, all conditions being equal, the place will be a money winner during the Fall and Winter. But if the receipts are poor during the Summer it cannot be argued that the house will not pay during the seasons to follow. So the box office is no indicator as to the future, aside from the instance of foregone conclusion I have cited. It is not in direct touch with the pulse of the people as much as is generally supposed. I refer to the box office of the moving picture theater. In theaters giving regular dramatic productions or vaudeville shows, the case is quite different. If a play or show does not take with the people, it will soon be demonstrated by the receipts, and it does not take a manager long to decide that he must withdraw a play and substitute something better. The box offices in the two spheres differ widely. Take, for instance, a period of hard times—when money is tight and people cannot afford to patronize amusements—the picture houses are the last to feel the pressure. The low prices account for this. Times are hard indeed when the people who want amusement cannot spare five or ten cents to get it.

But so much for the foundation upon which the exhibitor, as a rule, bases his predictions. Let us see upon what the film exchange man builds his hopes. It is upon good, hard cash investment. As business with him improves he increases his orders for new films, and when he does this you can bet a new hat that he knows what he is doing. Film exchanges are not stocked like hat or clothing stores in anticipation of seasons. They do not order a supply of certain films because they figure they will become popular during the approaching season. He orders films when his business requires them, and when you find him placing or increasing orders you can rest assured there is something doing in his vicinity.

I was asked the other day if I really believed the film business to-day is as extensive as it was a year ago, as far as it relates to disposals of films by manufacturers. This is a puzzling question. That is, it is difficult to give a direct and conclusive answer, for the reason that it is no easy matter to glean facts from the proper sources upon which to frame one. None of the manufacturers are disposed to make public the number of reels they put out in a week, month or year. Each naturally wants to create the impression that he is leading the other fellows, and any figures they furnish are given with that in view. I understand that it is known in certain quarters just how many reels each concern disposes of (I am assured this is the case in the licensed field), but the data is jealously guarded and there is not the remotest chance of getting any of it for publication. So in making answer to the question propounded by my friend I have but one source from which to glean facts, and that is the film exchange. I have had the privilege of getting them unofficially from exchanges in the East and West and I am prepared to state that the business on the manufacturing end is in excess of what it was last year. To offset any argument to the contrary, I wish to add that my answer is strengthened by the fact that I have in mind one manufacturing concern that issued but two reels per week last Summer and Fall and is now issuing, and has been since the early part of last Winter, three reels. There is also a concern that has been added to the licensed field during the past few months.

The friend who asked the question I have answered, confessed he did so to help form an idea as to whether the moving picture business was increasing, had reached its limit, or was receding. He said he believed the manufacturing end was a good point of view, because there must naturally be an outlet to justify increased manufacture. This is very true, but the conditions are not the same as in the commercial fields. If a corporation steadily increases its manufacture of domestic articles, wearing apparel or building material, there must naturally be a steady increase of consumption to justify it. The same condition need not exist in the moving picture business, only to a certain extent. The outlet may cease practically at the film exchange. It does not follow that when more films are produced, more picture houses are opened and more exhibitors enter the field. In this respect, as in many others, the moving picture business has a peculiar identity. Increased output is looked upon as an indication of improved service. The exchanges are in a better position to improve the programs of the exhibitors, and the patrons of the shows, seeing the improvement, increase their patronage. So this is where the wheel works within a wheel in a financial sense. If the exhibitor is not enabled to raise his price of admission, he at least gains by increased patronage; the exchange is enabled to ask more money for his service, and the manufacturer finds his revenue increased, and so everybody should be happy.

A reader sends me the following: "Man-About-Town—I am not in the picture business, but I take a great interest in it and read The Moving Picture World every day. I want some advice. I have a nice business from which I get a good revenue. A friend of mine has been at me for some time to sell out and go into the nickelodeon business. Do you think it would be a good move?"

I like to be accommodating, but I must decline to answer the question, for many very good reasons. The policy of this paper is to do all it can for the interests of the moving picture business, and this policy has been so well defined it must be apparent to all our readers that it is foreign to our province to convert people to the exhibition field. We have made but one exception during our career and it has been universally endorsed. To get the junk shops out of the business we have urged people with capital to enter the exhibition field and provide larger and better equipped picture houses, as well as provide more up-to-date and high-grade programs. If the correspondent is a man who is able and willing to accept this invitation, we will greet him most cordially. But we are not in the real estate business, as it were, holding out inducements to get settlers, and above all we would not tell any man to sell out and come in with us The confidence reposed in us is flattering to the point of embarrassment. The writer may be of the caliber that would be a welcome addition to the exhibiting field, and he may not. In saying this, we refer to his ability and not in any way to his integrity. Some very good men have gone into the business and failed. Many men not quite up to the same mark have been very successful. Most of the men who failed were those who looked upon a picture house as an automatic money producer. They thought the only requisite was a handful of money for a start and expected to see the returns grow like weeds in a garden. Others were lured by that peculiar anxiety to become associated with something having a theatrical flavor. It tasted good for a while. They posed in front of the picture place and enjoyed the chest-swelling thrill that is created when the susceptible investor is pointed to as the manager of the show by the girls when they pass in or out, or pass by. Most of these gentlemen are now posing behind ribbon counters or shooting schooners over bars. They have learned that the enchantment of the business is insignificant. Success in it is only attained by business ability, and very often by hard-earned experience.

P. P. Craft, manager of the Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill Film Company, is tearing around with wrath in his eye because someone has dared to issue a set of Buffalo Bill slides He claims that his company has the sole rights to immortalize in pictures the famous two Bills. He says those rights cost big money, and he talks of injunction suits and so forth

As proof of his claims he thrusts upon us two telegrams:

New York, September 3, 1910.

To Major G. W. Lillie (Pawnee Bill),
Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill Show,
Missoula, Mont.

Are Buffalo Bill slides now advertised authorized by management. Please answer quick. P. P. CRAFT.

Missoula, Mont., September 3, 1910.

To P. P. Craft,
Care Frank Winch, 1440 Broadway, New York.

Positively not; you have the only and exclusive rights.
BUFFALO BILL—PAWNEE BILL COMPANY,
G. W. Lillie, Manager.

Now the Buffalo Bill slides are not in the fake class. They are made from negatives taken at recent Buffalo Bill shows by newspaper photographers and from pictures which have been given for publication to the newspapers by the Buffalo Bill press agents. These pictures were given out with no restrictions and their use for slides is just as permissible as in the newspapers. Therefore we imagine friend Craft will have the time of his life if he tries to prevent their sale or use.

And what's the use? Good B. B. slides will help advertise good B. B. films and sustain the interest in them.

Buffalo Bill is a name to conjure with amongst the youth of the land. The very name on the poster at the theater door would mean a full house. For nearly fifty years Col. Cody has been before the public eye, so that when the pictures of his farewell round-up are announced, not only the youth but the boys of fifty will want to see them.

We have seen enough of the film to say that the photography of the three reels is remarkably good. And the acting—well, you wouldnot want to see the "Two Bills" and their troupe of rough riders "act" as we see it done by the average moving picture actor. No, you want to see them go through their regular drills and evolutions and perform their great feats of daring naturally and as they have done it for the past decade. And this is what you will see. Here is the program as it is shown in 3,000 feet of film: A Grand Review—The World's Rough Riders, introduced and led by Buffalo Bill (Col. Wm. F. Cody)—U. S. Artillery and Cavalry Drill—The Buffalo and the Famous Huntsman in Pursuit of His Native Game—The Prairie Under a Scorching Sun: "Oh! What a Good Drink; Pass It Around"—Mexican Joe Will Illustrate the Use of a Lasso—Perfection of High School Equestrianism: Mr. Ray Thompson's Mixed Blood Texas Range Horses—Mr. Rhoda Royal's "Famed Blue Ribbon" Thoroughbreds—Rossi's Musical Elephants—Riding Wild Bucking Horses and Mules, introducing the Only Lady Bucking Horse Rider in the World—Buffalo Bill Shooting Glass Balls—Arabian Acrobats—Japanese Troupe—Devlin's Zouaves—A Grand Military Tournament—Football on Horseback, Between Indians and Cowboys—The Far East—Trained Arabian Horses—The Final Salute! Buffalo Bill Bids You Good-bye.

THE NEW MAJESTIC AT LOCKPORT, N. Y.

A representative of the Moving Picture World dropped into the just completed new Majestic Theater at 66 Main street in Lockport, N. Y., and though it was Labor Day, men were busily installing the comfortable and attractive seats, in order to open the house the following day. The owner of this notable addition to the amusement attractions of the City of the Locks is Sam Kauffman, one of the most progressive clothing and haberdashery merchants of Lockport. Chatting to the World, Mr. Kauffman said the policy of the Majestic will be to offer only such pictures, songs and music as will meet with the approval of the best home element of the city, and of mothers, fathers and families.

The personnel of the new house is as follows: Sam Kauffman, proprietor; L. S. Blosser, manager; F. W. Korff, chief electrician; F. W. Aitkens, operator; Miss Mabel Burns, singer; Paul Buddenhagen, drums and traps; Miss Stella Weber, pianist.

Mr. Kauffman feels that with the above on the roster of artists, the Majestic will easily rank first, and quickly become the most popular picture house in Lockport. He paid an earnest tribute to Chief Operator F. W. Aitkens, describing him as a careful, painstaking, experienced man, whose electrical knowledge, gained when working as an electrician before becoming an operator, is of decided advantage. One of the "quiet sort" of men Aitkens evidently is, with abundant reserve force and ability to "make good."

A few lines as to the equipment of the Majestic: The projecting curtain is one of the best, peculiarly constructed so that the pictures pulsate with life and color, with much sharpness of detail and distinctiveness of outline. Cooling and ventilating system consists of an immense electrical exhaust fan, capable of withdrawing 8,500 cubic feet of air a minute. The hall is over a hundred feet in depth, with almost five hundred seating capacity. The latest style chairs, each with hat rack, are here. Finished in white and green, with an alabaster white marble mosaic tiling entrance, the Majestic opens spic and span. Tungsten light street signs and attractive bronze announcement lobby easels add to the distinctive appearance of the Majestic.

CHAMPION FILM MAKES GOOD.

Congratulations to the genial Mark Dintenfass and those associated with him in the continual and consistent progress in quality which the Champion pictures are manifesting. It is always a pleasure to us to meet moving picture manufacturers especially those who have recently entered the field, who are not unwilling to learn from those who, like ourselves, have given this matter of the theory and practice of picture making years of study,—we say, it is always a pleasure to meet gentlemen of this kind who are not unwilling to receive a few friendly hints as to what is desirable for success in the modern moving picture. Careful readers of The Moving Picture World will remember that last year, and since, we repeatedly laid down a formula, especially addressed to beginners in the game of making pictures. Briefly it is this: a simple story clearly told and good photography. There you have the formula for the beginner in a nut shell. It is a formula which has worked out successfully over and over again, even in the hands of those, both in this country and elsewhere, who have been long in the business and are making lots of money out of it.

One day last week we were especially invited by Mr. Dintenfass to witness his latest release, called "His Indian Bride." Looking at pictures, as the reader knows, is no novelty to us, and now and again we are tempted to feel somewhat blase and disgruntled, especially when the neophitic know-it-all who has recently entered the game starts laying down the law to us. No such experience attended us when we were looking at the latest Champion film. Here we were gratified to see a very fine piece of photographic work indeed. Not perhaps flawless, but clean, nice colored images, showing care in exposure and development. And then the story: a simple and convincing one which we are confident will win the suffrages of the exchanges and the Independent exhibitors. A white man falls in love with an Indian girl, who becomes his bride. She is received by his family, but shortly is suspected of dishonorable conduct by her husband. Her pride revolting, she returns to her own people, whither she is followed by her husband who, having learned that his Indian wife is guiltless of the charges laid to her by a jealous white woman, begs her forgiveness and receives it. A very pretty, simple, little story that all can understand at first glance. There are not too many characters in the piece, which is worked out nicely. The acting is good and natural with both Indians and whites; the interior scenes are nice and refined, and the entire picture constitutes a very marked advance in Champion releases. We hope the Champion Company will go from success to success.

GREATER NEW YORK HAS A MODEL PICTURE HOUSE.

But You Have to Go to the Suburbs to See It.

THE "T. N. F." THEATER IN THE CENTRE OF ARISTOCRATIC FLATBUSH.

The "T. N. F." Theater was opened on Saturday, August 17, at East Sixteenth street and Newkirk avenue, Flatbush, and if the first two weeks of its existence are taken as a criterion of what the future is to unfold, this handsome little place of amusement is destined to a career of unbounded popularity and success. The owner is Ben. Title, secretary and treasurer of the Exhibitors' Advertising and Specialty Company, of 105 East Fourteenth street, New York City. He is generally well known in the moving picture industry and is the man with the proper personality, nerve and push to exhibit in a place like Flatbush. He has some excellent and original ideas on exhibiting and has always been identified with every movement for the advancement and uplifting of the moving picture business. He was vice-president of the old Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association and has fought his way up with the industry from its inception.

The absolute success of the "T. N. F." Theater is one of the strongest evidences of the welcome reception moving picture houses are receiving from residents of the exclusive residential sections and heralds the dawn of one of the brightest eras for the great enterprise. Figuratively speaking, the "open sesame" to new and undreamed realms has been discovered.

There is without a doubt no more aristocratic or select suburban residential section around the metropolis than is the exclusive Midwood section of Flatbush, and in the heart of this, surrounded by costly homes with beautifully laid out grounds, Mr. Title erected his building. When the word was passed around of what was happening, the residents were (to use an expressive term) furious, and they never hesitated to express their wrath and indignation at the "outrage." If Mr. Brown met Mr. Smith, the conversation usually turned to the new moving picture theater, and then both of them would give vent to their feelings, and could Mr. Title have heard the numerous uncomplimentary things that were being said about his pet project and the very warm climate it was frequently consigned to, he would have taken still further precautions to make the building fireproof. But the work went on and the theater was completed. The opening night was as grand a success as any great playhouse ever enjoyed, only on a small scale. Outside the doors stood a number of automobiles, and when these went, others came—they do things in style in Flatbush! Reel after reel the pictures went off and never was a playwright in all his triumph more happy than Mr. Title. And that is the way it has been every night since, and strangest of all is the fact that all of the grumbling Mr. Smiths and Mr. Browns have been seen there with the Mrs. Smiths and Mrs. Browns and the little Smiths and Browns. Never could a Methodist revival camp meeting boast of more converts to the Gospel than the "T. N. F." Theater can boast of to the moving picture.

You are saying: "How did it ever happen? How did such a complete metamorphosis ever take place in the minds of Flatbushites so that after first holding the place in contempt they are now to be seen there with their families?"

The secret of this success has been explained time and again in The World, and it is well within the power of any exhibitor. It is simply this: Meet the public fairly. Give them a beautiful airy place to come to; polite, considerate treatment; study your audience and give them the very best both in pictures and music, and when they see that you are laboring to please them they will find pleasure in coming.

In constructing and operating the "T. N. F." Theater nothing has been spared, as you will see from the following description: The front of the building is not overdecorated. It is as simple in its cream, gold and silver decoration as possible and harmonizes with the surrounding green lawn. The interior is finished in varying shades of green, with gold and silver trimming. The seating capacity is 300 and there are aisles running down each side, five feet in width. The ceiling is 25 feet high and has four large skylight ventilators. There are six electric fans placed on the side walls at regular intervals, and these, with the ventilators, keep the hall always filled with fresh, pure air. There is a decided pitch to the floor and the seats are so arranged that every person has a full view of the screen. There is a pit at the foot of the screen the same as the orchestra pit in a regular playhouse, surrounded by a brass rail from which is draped a heavy velvet curtain, and in here is the piano as well as several hundred dollars' worth of mechanical effects. On both sides of the screen are imitation boxes beautifully draped and filled with palms. The floor is heavily carpeted and exquisite clusters of electric lights throw the place into instant and brilliant illumination. There are six exits and they are equipped with exit bar locks usually seen only in the large playhouse where the fire law requires them. A dainty dressing room with every accessory is at one side for the ladies and there is another opposite for men. Uniformed ushers are in attendance and refreshments such as ice-cream and cake are served to patrons in their seats or in an annexed parlor. Arrangements are now being made for the accommodation of automobiles and checks are to be issued while the owners are inside.

Chief Oliver of the License Bureau visited the place personally and expressed his highest approbation at what he saw. Nothing, in fact, that could add to the safety, comfort and happiness of the patrons of the "T. N. F." Theater has been left undone. A. H. M.

A TALK ON CARBONS AND THEIR MANUFACTURE.

By an Expert of the Charles L. Kiewert Company.

With the rapid development of motion picture apparatus and accessories and the constantly rising standard of excellence, there is more and more necessity for the operator thoroughly to understand the details of his art, which were a few years ago considered out of his range of interest. This is evidenced by the constantly increasing space which trade papers are giving to the technical side of the business. It is perhaps not too much to say that the carbon is the most important part of the motion picture equipment, as it must produce the light upon which the projection depends.

Theoretically, the electric arc carbon, in as far as light production is concerned, is merely a small body of white hot carbon. Considering the direct current arc: The current flowing from the arc into the negative carbon (electricity is always regarded as flowing from positive to negative) is accompanied by minute particles of carbon breaking away from the negative and rushing with tremendous velocity "up stream" and striking on the positive carbon, quickly raising a portion of it to white heat, in much the same manner as the blacksmith may by repeated vigorous blows, raise cold iron to a welding temperature. This produces the electric arc, which is, for picture purposes, always made by the use of carbon tips. A number of materials will produce the same result, but carbon is used, first, because the product of burning is a gas and does not either interfere with the subsequent operation of the arc, nor soil the lamp house with deposit; second, the light produced is of a substantially white color; third, carbon will stand a high temperature without disintegrating, and hence the quantity of light, which depends largely upon temperature, is increased.

Let us now see what requirements the perfect carbon must fulfil. First, it must be pure, as impurities might produce troublesome difficulties, alter the color of the light, or cause irregular burning. Second, the carbon must be uniform in hardness and composition to insure even burning and steady light. Third, it must be of the proper degree of hardness. The color of the light from a heated object depends on the temperature, running from red to white as the temperature increases. The temperature at which the carbon burns increases with its hardness. It has been difficult, however, to manufacture carbon giving an absolutely pure white light, on account of the fact that the harder the carbon, the more expensive the process of producing the carbon that will make a steady and even light. For this reason the ordinary picture machine lamp carbons are made very soft, and while cheap and easy to operate, produce a yellowish light and burn away rapidly.

It has been discovered, however, that certain chemicals placed in the core of a perfectly pure and uniform hard carbon, permit the arc to burn even steadier than the soft carbon arc, and give a whiter and stronger light. It is also found that the light is of a peculiar soft quality, which eliminates the sharpness so often produced by the ordinary carbons. This discovery was made by a chemist in the laboratory of one of the leading American manufacturers, who immediately made arrangements to manufacture and market the carbon, which we have named the "Bio." Although, on account of the absence of pure raw material in America, it was necessary to arrange for the manufacture of the carbon in Germany, it is distinctly an American product, and is another instance of the triumph of the American brain and energy over foreign competitors in the commercial race.

Another point of superiority of the "Bio" carbon is the extremely long life, which is from 25 to 40 per cent. greater than that of the ordinary projector carbon. This naturally follows from the hardness of the "Bio" carbon and is accompanied by another advantage, viz., that the arc operates at a higher voltage and, consequently, greater length. This makes it easier to keep the lower carbon from getting in the way of the light from the upper, and throwing a "ghost" on the screen. On account of the fact that there are a great many machines which cannot be adjusted to the voltage required by the high voltage carbon, the "Bio" carbon is also manufactured in a low voltage grade, which, while lacking the unique qualities of the high voltage grade, have several points of superiority over other soft, or low voltage, carbons now on the market.

The process of manufacturing the "Bio" carbons is interesting and instructive: As stated before, purity is of foremost importance. Only one commercial source of absolutely pure carbon is available. This is the soot produced by burning resin, with an insufficient supply of air. Carbons made of pure soot are the hardest carbons obtainable, and, as stated before, hard carbons have heretofore suffered under considerable difficulties in manufacture. The "Bio" process has, however, eliminated these difficulties and for the first time made possible the manufacture of a thoroughly satisfactory carbon of this quality. Germany is the only country where a cheap, pure soot of the required character can be economically obtained. It is this fact that has made the product of the German manufacturers famous throughout the world. "Bio" carbons are made in the largest and best known carbon works in the world, under the supervision of a chemist representing the American house, and go through the following processes:

The raw material is finely and evenly pulverized in special mills, and any particles of iron which may have been ground from the rollers by the great pressure, are removed by powerful magnets. It is then mixed with a binder, of refined tar, chemically freed from any traces of mixture. The mass is next passed between steel rollers, with case-hardened, polished surfaces, and then formed by power hammers into blocks about twelve inches in diameter and sixteen inches in height. These blocks are then placed in hydraulic presses, working at 3,000 to 6,000 pounds per square inch pressure, and pressed through a die of the required diameter, which is fitted with a needle in the center, which forms a star-shaped core. In front of the die is a disc which bears on its edge the words "Bio, Germany," which are thus impressed in the surface of the carbon. These tubes are cut into pieces about one meter (39 inches) in length, and rolled down a perfectly smooth, flat surface, thus straightening themselves. They are then made into bundles which are packed in fireclay crucibles and surrounded with powdered coke, to exclude the air. These crucibles are then subjected to a temperature of 2,500 to 3,000 degrees for ten days, in furnaces of special and uniform diameter, pointed, and the core is filled with a secret compound. The carbons are then dried and packed and shipped to America.

"Like old times," says I to myself, says I, one morning last week when I meandered through the purlieus of Columbus avenue, New York City, round about the "hundreds." Overhead the fearful and wonderful Elevated pursued its thunderous course; round about me were the housewives of this section of the city, making their purchases in preparation for their Sunday dinners. "Lord Sakes!" I can hear some of you saying, "What has all THIS to do with moving pictures?" Now, be patient, all of you, and I will tell you. It is a very curious feature in the history of any industry that expansion seems to take, or rather follow, a certain definite law. You start a business, and you open shop or a little plant near the center of things. Then, as things prosper with you, you get a few miles out towards suburbia, and then, when more prosperity comes, you take the "bull by the horns," run right into the country, and build a big factory. Myriads of businesses have started and flourished this way.

The "Imp," or Independent Moving Pictures Company of America, to give its full and lordly title, is, I imagine, in the second stage of this process. The factory has jumped from Fourteenth street to 101st street. Some time ago, when I said nice things about my friend Carl Laemmle, the gentleman at Chicago who writes those very ornate and arresting advertisements, returned the compliment by saying nice things about me. He said I was one of the deepest students of the moving picture on earth. So I am. That is why I penetrated into Columbus avenue and 101st street last Saturday morning when the local ladies were buying their meat, and vegetables, and other things, for Sunday's dinner.

This is not the first time by many dozens that I have traced an industrial concern into an industrial neighborhood. As I have already said, the Imp Company is probably in the second stage of its career. By this time next year, it will probably be building, or have built, a factory some twenty or thirty miles up the Hudson. I hope it will. For if it does, it will surely be symptomatic of the spread and growth of the moving picture business as a whole: a consummation most devoutly to be wished. Prosperity for all, is my motto.

"Like old times," I repeated to myself when I got into the loft building, one floor of which—and a very large floor it is—is occupied in the making of Imp positives. A very considerable part of my life has been passed in the photographic dark room, and though of late my lines have been cast in other directions, yet I always feel happy when I get in an eerie-looking apartment which is illuminated by ruby-colored lamps. So I was quite at home when, after a preliminary look around the offices, projection rooms, developing rooms and other parts of the great floor at 101st street and Columbus avenue, New York City—I say I was quite at home when at last I found myself in the Imp Company's dark room with a staff of help busily engaged in the developing, washing, and fixing of "Imp" positive films. A nod to "Doc" Willat, a "How do you do?" and then I began to ply the man in charge of the developing, as to what developer he used, how long he developed, how he washed, fixed, etc., the lengths of the positive pictures wound on the rectangular frames that are inserted into the various solutions, one after the other, etc., etc. Verily, it was like old times, taking me back to a period in my life when I used to do the same kind of work.

Mr. Cochrane, looking bright and well after his recent holiday, was proud of his plant and the rapidity with which it had been got into working order. How many thousand feet per day the plant is capable of turning out, perhaps I had better not say. Anyway, here was visible evidence of the reality of the Imp Company's activity in the making of moving picture positives. Everything going at high pressure; everybody busy; the talk being of future expansion: a state of things which is certainly good. Unquestionably the Imp Company has made good in the production of their pictures. It seems only yesterday that they were talking about making pictures. Then, in a flash, they were installed at Fourteenth street, now they are at 101st street. By and bye, I predict they will be in the country with a specially erected plant.

There is something about the development of the photographic positive, whether on film or paper, which seems never to lose its fascination. Come to think of it, it really is a wonderful thing, that from a whitish surface, in a dark room, the application of a colorless solution should produce a beautiful image. Nobody who has ever got the fever and the excitement of developing, whether it be on the large scale or the small scale, ever takes leave of the delight in seeing an image grow under his hands. Moreover, speaking from the point of view of the practical worker, there is always a pleasure in the completion of such a picture. You feel, in a small way, something of the emotions of a painter or a sculptor, who by his own hands, fashions a statue or a painting out of inert material. It is, in a sense, creative work, for you are to some extent producing something, if not out of nothing, at any rate out of what looks like, ab initio, very unpromising, very unplastic material.

Of course, in the making of moving pictures, you have many disappointments. The raw stock is not always good and reliable. It fogs, or gives spots. Its sensitiveness is not uniform, and so you are bound, in the nature of things, to have a certain proportion of failures. Everybody who has had anything to do with the making of moving pictures, knows that this is inevitable. But, on the other hand, your successes atone for, or obliterate, your failures. It is a nice feeling, that of having charge of a moving picture dark room and turning out thousands after thousands of feet of good, regular, well-exposed, carefully developed positives. It compensates for a lot: for immurement in a dark room, and working in a dull red light, and by no means the healthiest atmosphere. You feel that you are ministering to the pleasure of countless thousands by means of the little pictures that you are developing so nicely, cleanly and neatly.

These, dear brethren, were some of the reflections that passed through my mind when making an inspection of the Imp plant, the other morning. All concerned in the erection of that plant are distinctly to be congratulated. It seems to be efficient and practical. I am not going to say that it is the best plant in existence, but it is away ahead of many others that I have seen—older plants and larger plants. It will do all the work that it is said to do, and do it well. And now, friend Cochrane, if, by this time next year you are not in charge of a specially erected plant away in the country, with an infinitely greater capacity than the one you have just started in, I'm a Dutchman. So go ahead, Thomas D.

LITTLE THINGS.

It is easy to build a big, beautiful theater with long projection, comfortable seats and other things to make it pleasant for patrons but after it is done not all managers care for those patrons and add to their comfort.

For example, Keith & Proctor have had ice water passed all through the Summer, and that, too, when an announcement slide plainly says that all service is free. The attendants are polite and watch very carefully that one patron does not interfere with the comfort of another.

Labor Day the Fourteenth Street Theater was filled to the topmost seat in the topmost gallery. It was warm, too, up in that loft, but it was that or nothing a good part of the day. A man would remove his coat. Instantly an attendant told him to replace his coat or leave the building. A lady would not remove her hat. She heard the same whisper.

These little things are mentioned as suggestions for others who may not be as well situated. It can be done in any theater. It only requires a spinal column of a little greater consistency than gelatine. The law is on the side of the management and anything that interferes with, or annoys, a patron should be ruthlessly suppressed.

"Fitful Peggy" (BiBograph).—A rather entertaining film in which those commendable traits of character, truthfulness and honesty, are graphically displayed. Peggy speedily makes everyone thoroughly acquainted with her strict adherence to both. Admirers find that she will tolerate no trifling, and though she may be awkward and unacquainted with usages in the new society to which she has been unexpectedly introduced, the vigorous way she has of making those who try to take advantage of her understand that they must keep her distance causes them all to seek cover. There is life, action, and what may be termed freshness in the picture. It is staged and photographed in the usual Biograph manner, and adds to the program a touch of originality.

"The Anarchistic Grip" (Lubin).—Imagination is often responsible for a good many things that provide plenty of thrills, but are not so. Here is a clock salesman's grip, containing samples. A tramp steals and when he hears the ticking inside imagines it contains an infernal machine. It is passed along to the police and they handle it very discreetly, each preferring that the next fellow should be the one to investigate its contents. Fortunately the salesman comes in to report the theft of his samples and the excitement ceases when so common a thing as a clock is exposed to view. The humor in this picture is contagious and it becomes funnier every minute, as the film runs.

"The Dream Pill" (Lubin).—A story with a number of funny trick effects. The pill is guaranteed as a sure cure for nightmare, and the tramp who takes the first pill is so suddenly transported to a new world, where adventures strange to him follow in rapid succession. It is a lively comedy and the numerous changes and surprises keep the interest at high pitch throughout.

"The Indian Raiders" (Selig).—An Indian picture which so faithfully reproduces the actual life of the plains that one wonders at the accomplishment. It is, perhaps, not too much to say that Selig has succeeded in transferring to the films the real life of the West, that mystical thing which is so baffling to the reproducer and yet so apparent to all who have seen it. Reproduction is likely to contain something of the personality of the reproducer, regardless of his endeavors to keep himself out of his work. Selig has accomplished this and this picture is presented as a transcript of an actual occurrence which typifies much of the life of the past and preserves in permanent form scenes which have gone never to return.

"The Affair of an Egg" (Biograph).—A humorous hit at two things; first, the practice of writing on an egg or some other article, asking the finder to write and second, the present custom of putting eggs in cold storage for indefinite periods. The man who got the egg replied to the woman who put her address upon it. But the denouement is different. The egg had been in storage for twenty years. No further description of what happened is necessary. There is a sparkling quality to this picture which makes it even more attractive than its title seems to warrant. The producer has given evidence of his ability in extracting fun from a cold storage egg.

"Muggsy Becomes a Hero" (Biograph).—This vigorous individual appears again as the protector of two lone spinsters set upon by tramps. Muggsy looks as though he had encountered a thrashing machine when he appears after the disturbance; but the tramps have to be carried away on stretchers. If his sweetheart was disposed to give him the cold shoulder once, she is justly proud of her hero now. Muggsy has successfully redeemed himself from whatever stigma attached to him before.

"The Man Who Died" (Lubin).—To have a supposed deceased brother appear unexpectedly and turn one out of the house where one is enjoying one's self is disconcerting, but this situation is the climax to a good story put on the screen by this house. Usurpation of a paralytic's house and complete possession when it is supposed that the unfortunate man is drowned. Then comes his reappearance, perfectly cured, and bringing with him a bride. The usurping brother is, in his turn, superceded and the cured paralytic and his bride enjoy their new found happiness.

"Won in the Fifth" (Melies).—Possibly exceptions will be taken to this picture because it represents a minister engaging in a boxing bout, even though for a worthy cause. The scene in the ring is lively enough, and the gratitude of the old fighter when the clergyman gives him the money is good to see. Ultimately a love story develops between the fighter's daughter and the young minister. Many will think a mistake has been made in representing a minister in the ring. Aside from that the film is harmless and sufficiently attractive to hold the interest of the audience.

"The Road to Richmond" (Selig).—A stirring war picture, including numerous incidents all told mid the roar of cannon and the smoke of battle. These war pictures of Selig's have a touch of reality, a sense of something beyond the picture, difficult to define, yet felt plainly enough by everyone who sees the films. They all possess a touch of life, or something closely akin, that lifts them out of the realm of cold reproductions and makes them seem to be portrayals of the actual scenes. This is one of the best of the numerous war dramas offered by this enterprising house, and it is no wonder the audience bursts into applause when the last scene disappears from the screen.

"The Man Who Learned" (Edison).—A very practical as well as useful film. Comparatively few can ever visit the dairy farms, but literally hundreds of thousands will see this picture and will acquire an almost first hand knowledge of the conditions which exist about the source of the milk supply. Not every dairyman has an object lesson in a sick grandchild to enforce the arguments advanced by those who favor improved methods; but perhaps the experience of this gentleman will be emphasized over and over as the film is shown successively to people all over the country. It is impossible to know too much about these matters and to get a really practical story of this sort on the screen is to enforce needed lessons in the sanitary production and distribution of milk. Incidentally it may be noted that the second series of pictures, showing how the work should be done is a partial explanation of the advance in price. The film, therefore, conveys valuable information in two ways. It shows the dangers inseparable from the old order, and partially explains the recent advance in price. It would be difficult to think of a picture that could give so much information and do it in such an entertaining way.

"Saved from Ruin" (Pathe).—A story of Monte Carlo which depicts graphically the dangers of the gaming table. Happily, however, the difficulties of this gentleman are overcome and he is placed upon his feet again by a generous friend. A bit of suggestiveness enters into it, but the possible taint is wiped out without injury to anyone and the benefactor gains a charming wife.

"Deer Hunting in the Celebus Islands" (Pathe).—A beautiful reproduction of the scenery of the Celebus and a graphic reproduction of some lively deer hunting scenes. The photography of this film is exceptionally clear and the view points are chosen with consummate skill and artistic knowledge.

"White Man's Money, the Red Man's Curse" (Kalem).—A careful study of the effects of the contact of the whites and the Indians and the influence the whites exert. Money is made the motive here, but it might quite as easily be something else. The study is carefully done, and the dangers which beset the red man when he comes in contact with the white man are graphically presented. The picture, apart from its present interest, has a good deal of historic value.

"A Life for a Life" (Vitagraph).—A lesson repeating once again the oft told story that love will conquer the hardest heart. Here is a convict made morose and sullen because a tame rat, his only friend, was killed. But by reason of kindness shown him by different individuals he overcomes those ugly tendencies, and his whole nature changes. And eventually he proves his sincerity by dashing into the flames and rescuing a child from certain death at the risk of his own life. The picture is dramatic, and emphasizes again the molding power of love.

"The Millionaire and the Ranch Girl" (Essanay).—A love story between a young millionaire and a Western ranch girl is not exactly a novelty, yet in the hands of the Essanay's company of capable players it assumes fresh interest. The situation of the letter, with the postscript torn off is really the basis of the story, and affords an opportunity for some clever work. It is, perhaps, as good as any Western story of recent date, and the denouement, when the millionaire compels his agent to admit his own duplicity supplies an intensely interesting climax. The love affair between the young man and Nellie is, of course, a necessary finale. The picture is good, and contains enough human interest to hold the close attention of any audience throughout its length.

"Calino Takes New Lodgings" (Gaumont).—A comedy with much of life in it. Why Calino takes new lodgings, and how he does it supply sufficient interest for a funny film.

"Maggy Hoolihan Gets a Job" (Pathe).—A humorous skit detailing the experiences of a freshly landed Irish girl, while seeking for a job. She tries several, but doesn't quite seem to fit. Then Clancy, the policeman, decides to marry her, and let her take care of his ten children. The curtain may safely fall at this point. Imagination will supply any details that may be required for the future. Anyhow, she puts it up to Clancy to accumulate the fortune she expected to find when she landed.

"The Wrong Box" (Vitagraph).—To get a pair of pajamas instead of a box of cut flowers and be asked to wear them at a reception is enough to arouse the temper of any girl. And unless he happened to stumble on the mistake it can be easily understood how mystified he would be in attempting to explain the young woman's sudden coldness. This situation is admirably worked out by the Vitagraph players and serves to make a humorous film of more than common interest. The girl had the art of making a monkey of the young man down to perfection. Any who are seeking suggestions for a similar performance can see this film to advantage.

"A Summer Idyl" (Biograph).—A picture that is different, so different that one is disposed to rub one's eyes to see if the scenario writer has actually dared to introduce an innovation and give a picture a new ending. Here is a city man who goes to a country in a huff, falls in love with the little country girl in the same old way, and then—well, the lure of the city is too strong, he goes back to his former sweetheart, leaving the country shepherdess to fill her grandfather's pipe and chase her sheep across the bridge as of yore. Of course she cries a bit. It needs a few tears to express the shattered emotion, but she accepts the inevitable with good grace and cuddles under her grandfather's wing in a very satisfactory and re-assuring way. So much for the story. The pictorial part is notable. The farm scenes were made while the farm operations were in progress. The harvesting scenes are faithful reproductions. The only criticism the writer has to offer is that the horses haul that reaper and binder faster than they do when actually at work. The machine would not stand such rapid motion. It couldn't. The reciprocating motion of the knife would tear the machine to pieces if it went long at that pace. The scene where they are loading the grain is an excellent reproduction. It is a picture worthy preservation. The man on the load knew what he was doing, he loaded the bundles right. Some farm scenes are carelessly composed, and not infrequently are wrong, but these deserve commendation for their accuracy. The tones in the picture are excellent. There it no soot and whitewash, but a soft gradation which is good to see and adds much to the pictorial effect. It is a notable production. And yet, it must go at the close of a day while poor vaudeville acts stay on.

"Who is Boss" (Pathe).—A rough house picture, offering a different version of the old mother-in-law joke. The man, after he has turned the whole house topsy turvy, and has thrown it out the window on the head of an inoffensive bilnd beggar below, stands amid the ruins and announces with much bravado that he is boss.

"Zoological Gardens in Antwerp" (Pathe)—Well photographed and accurately tinted pictures, illustrating the zoological gardens in Antwerp. Many interesting animals and birds are shown, most of them in motion, which adds greatly to their attractiveness. The views in the monkey house are worthy a film by themselves, they so faithfullly depict the characteristics of these strange creatures. The flight of the flamingoes is least satisfactory. They are so near the camera they blur in flying.

"Led by Little Hands" (Selig).—A tale that brings the tears. For nine long years the man mourns for his daughter, and she longs for him. Then the children wander away and find the grandpa quite by accident, and what he does for them will put strange, new ideas into the heads of many youngsters who may have a grandpa. Then comes a reunion, and grandpa and the kiddies go to sleep with the doll and the pony, quite filling the great arm chair where grandpa has sat so many hours alone. Somehow this touches the emotions so deeply that the tears rise unbidden, and not many eyes in the house were dry.

"The Big Scoop" (Edison).—A newspaper story, based upon the importance which is attached to a news story which no other paper has. Everything is a story in a newspaper office, by the way. The scenes here are realistic, those representing the interior of the newspaper office being made from life. The reporter's progress through New York's banking section is interesting and is a faithful reproduction of that section of New York. Then come the working out of the details of the way the story was obtained and what it meant to the reporter, to the paper that published it and to the wife of the reporter who waited for him at home long and anxiously. Newspaper stories are, as a rule, distorted, but in this instance the story seems to have been worked out with care and with attention to details. While not all newspaper offices are alike, there is a certain similarity in them all. And the views showing the interior of one here may serve as indicative of all daily offices. The life will, therefore, be interesting to those who are unfamiliar with it and will afford an insight into the way a daily paper is put together.

"Chew-Chew Land" (Vitagraph).—A story that will please the children. In a dream a little boy visits Chew-Chew Land and the many wonders he sees there are duly related to his mother in the morning. And they are wonders, too, each one more remarkable than the last. Wriggles, the guide, very carefully points out all these marvels and the little boy's eyes grow big with wonder as they go from one to another.

"A Rough Weather Courtship" (Vitagraph).—A story of courtship on shipboard, with a pretty widow, various attentive passengers, the captain and seasickness as the principal actors in the little drama. When the mal de mer drives all the passengers below the captain discovers that he has a chance and before the others appear above the decks he has secured the prize and has her fast. He is master of courtship as well as his own ship.

"A Dog on Business" (Essanay).—Yes, it was, but it brought the tramp, and perhaps it is not too much to hope, the hungry, homeless cur that inspired the brilliant thought, something that at least made them more comfortable. One after another, all sorts and conditions of people, pay their fee, take a dog and go around to the advertised house to claim the reward. Finally they all got there. Then the perpetrator of the thing wanders around to see the fun, and he sees it. The ending, when the bull pup the Jew took around grabs him by the seat of the trousers and refuses to let go, is fast and furious. There is enough novelty and originality in this to suit any who want something alive and out of the ordinary run of films.

"Mama's Birthday Present" (Kalem).—Whenever you intend to give your wife a birthday present of a dog, either don't hide the beast in a closet, or else tell your wife all about it. Here is the story of a man who failed to do either and the complications supply a quarter hour of very lively fun. It worked out in the end without serious damage, but the agonies suffered by those most interested are amusing enough to please anyone excepting a chronic grouch. It might be that a chronic grouch would be helped, if not cured, by this picture.

"Ingratitude" (Urban).—Not a pleasant picture to see, yet one unquestionably too true to life. Over and over again men have found how unwise it is to give their property to people in return for a living and this film graphically illustrates that fact. But a band of revolutionists begin a series of depredations and the ungrateful son is severely used, losing all he has. Meanwhile the abused old man has been favored by fortune, and forgets the past, succoring the ruined man far beyond his just deserts. It is scarcely necessary to attempt a criticism of a film of this type. It represents a condition that exists in more than one instance, making plain its meaning. Scarcely anything else is needed. All the same it is not a pleasant subject, suffering in this direction because it tells the story so well.

"The Gambler's Wife" (Pathe).—Not every gambler has a bad dream at the critical moment in his career that exerts a powerful influence toward reformation, nor does every gambler have a wife who can go in and clean out the winners like this one; hence, the film presents novel conditions that serve to increase the interest. Then comes permanent reformation, which is the proper ending for this sermon on the screen. Such preaching as this should exert a beneficial influence.

"Military Kite Flying at Rheimes" (Urban).—For ages kites have been toys, yet here are scenes showing how effective they may become when constructed upon a large enough scale to bear heavy loads. The scenes here depicted represent how useful they may be in war. The way they are put together and handled are interesting features well worth seeing.

INDEPENDENT.

"Hazing a New Scholar" (Defender).—A reproduction of a hazing scene which in days past has had a counterpart in more than one college. The unfortunate youth recovers, is made a member of the inner circle, and is assured that he can assist when the next new student arrives and is initiated into the picturesque thoughtfulness of college hazing methods.

"In the Days of the First Christians" (Film d'Art).—Here is a thousand feet of beautifully tinted and toned film, representing the persecutions in the days of Nero when Christians were disposed of by subjecting them to every species of cruelty which the diabolical mind of the torturers could devise. The story is of a girl who is saved from crucifixion by a self sacrifice which appeals very strongly to the sympathies. It must not be considered that this is a pleasant film to look upon. Quite the contrary. But it does convey a reasonably accurate impression of what it meant to be a Christian in those times, and it reproduces ancient Roman scenes with a fair degree of accuracy. Much good work has been done upon it, but after one has seen it, the impression is so strong that one almost wishes one had never seen it. The suggestions of the film are all too horrible to be pleasing.

"The Caprice of a Dame" (Ambrosio).—A love story, with a disturbance introduced in the form of a high-born dame who induces a simple-minded shepherd to make love to her. But the separation ends in a reunion and probably happiness afterward.

"Fricot Has Lost His Collar Button" (Ambrosio).—And because he can't find it everything is turned topsy turvy in general demolition proceedings. The housekeeper interposes while the wrecking process is at its height and Fricot is handled in a manner befitting the occasion. Then as a climax to all this confusion and ruin the button is found in a button hole in the collar.

"The Snorer" (Atlas).—A comedy well worth seeing, purporting to be the experience of a man who was unfortunate enough to snore. What he got, and how severe was the application should be a warning to all similarly afflicted mortals who insist upon disturbing the peace of their neighbors with the most disagreeable of all noises. And when, realizing the oft repeated fact that in only one place is there rest for the weary he hies himself to the cemetery. Even the slumberers there arise and eject him in no uncertain manner from the domain which is rightfully their own.

"His Indian Bride" (Champion).—An Indian picture that is different in that it graphically represents the true worth of an Indian girl, even when her husband accuses her of things of which she is not guilty. Eventually, however, the man's haughty mother and sister relent and the cruelly abused wife is sought by her husband and brought home amid general rejoicing. The picture contains so much of human nature that it touches the emotions deeply and one almost wants to administer to the mother and sister their just deserts.

"The Moonshiner's Daughter" (Nestor).—Romance seems to be a necessary portion of the life of a moonshiner. Moonshiners always have pretty daughters, too, most of whom are languishing for some bold man to appear and love them. Considerable interest attaches to this film, partly because of the love story connected with it and partly because of the grim illustration it gives of the life of the moonshiner and how dangerous it is for a stranger to wander near an illicit still. Fortunately, perhaps, for all, the stranger here depicted lacked sand and the lovers eventually overcome the objections of the girl's people. Loving a moonshiner's daughter, under the conditions here presented would not be an especially attractive pastime.

"For the Sunday Edition" (Imp).—A melo-dramatic newspaper love story, of a somewhat dime novel flavor. The reporter, captured, is helped by the girl who leads the gang. He sends carrier pigeons to his office, which squares well with the story. But the inference is that the girl, in summoning assistance, sends to the office one of her own carrier pigeons. Just where did she find a pigeon so intelligent that it could be sent at will? The knowledge would be extremely valuable. There is plenty of action in the story, and heart interest is supplied by the heart of the maid responding to the heart of the man, as it was in days of yore.

"The Great Marshall Jewell Case" (Defender).—Hidden and overlaid, perhaps, by the consequences of criminal surroundings and influences, there is in every heart an unmistakable impulse to a better life. If right influences are brought to bear these impulses will develop until they produce a complete change of life. Ruth, in this story is inured to a life of crime, yet because she is shown a kindness when she had no reason to expect consideration she leaves her old life and begins anew. Long after her benefactor finds her and their two hearts meeting in mutual recognition and trust, they bury their past and together look forward to the future. The picture is simple. It tells a simple story; yet it is dramatic in its suggestion and appeals strongly to one's sense of right because it seems to supply additional proof that the struggle upward of the good in the human heart is not in vain.

"That Letter from Teddy" (Defender).—Represents the discomfiture of a jealous husband who suspects his wife and is introduced to an unknown brother-in-law. The picture presents an old subject, and offers no novel reason for doing it.

"The Right Girl" (Imp).—A love story of an heiress incog, receiving the attentions of a young man who is looking for her and doesn't know he has her. It is a love story, told in quite the same old way, with few embellishments or additions. But because it deals with an affair of the heart possesses a degree of interest out of proportion to its dramatic qualities.

"King of a Day" (Film d'Art).—Albert Lambert, a notable French actor, plays the part of Masaniello, a leader of the people, in a masterly way. Driven mad by a poison administered by an enemy, he marches down the street, compelling all to do homage to him. Torn to pieces by the mob, his enemy sheds a tear over his body and reimposes the taxes against which he rebelled. The excellent acting in depicting the madman is a dramatic triumph for the motion picture and presents some of the remarkable possibilities of the picture when in the hands of a master producer. King for a Day is one of the best films that have come from the Independents in many weeks.

"Aunt Tabitha's Monkey" (Lux).—For a joke a man is substituted for a woman's pet monkey. The humorous situations that develop represent interesting possibilities.

"The Selfish Man's Lesson" (Lux).—It was only a dream, but it was effective in showing a man the sin of his selfishness. And because of that he changes the whole course of his life.

"The Night Rustlers" (Bison).—A Western yarn of rustlers and cowboys, with love making introduced on the side and some brilliant horsemanship as a feature. The story is good enough of its class, but coming with so many other cowboy stories it fails to receive the attention its merits might actually warrant. If this liberal output of Wild West and cowboy pictures, all good in their way, were interspersed with some of equal activity, but in a different vein, it would be better for the patronage at some of the theaters where there has been a surfeit of such scenes.

"A Fresh Start" (Thanhouser).—A melo-dramatic recital of a chauffeur's sudden reform and a thrilling rescue of a girl stolen by men who expect a ransom. He takes the subsidized chauffeur's place and drives the lovely duet to the police station. As a reward he gets a life position, so favorably do the fates conspire in his behalf. Pictures like this might serve as an encouragement to reformation, but it is better to consider them as a species of entertainment, not to be despised, and yet, on the other hand, not to be accepted too literally.

"The Little Drummer Boy" (Great Northern).—A war story of Napoleon's time, developing some genuine thrills, but having a melancholy ending. The captured drummer boy, from the hostile camp, gives the alarm that warns Napoleon's soldiers of their danger. But he is killed, and his reward, though bestowed by Napoleon himself and the greatest that can be bestowed, lies unheeded upon his breast. The artistic merit of the story is undeniable and the actors perform their parts admirably, but as the film disappears leaving only the impression of the poor little dead body, decorated with the coveted cross, one cannot prevent a choking sensation. The picture is so realistic that this occurs entirely unbidden.

"Fabian Hunting Rats" (Great Northern).—The comedian is represented in another picture which possesses merit as a comedy. It is funny, so funny, indeed, that more than one commented favorably upon it. This comedian is an addition worth while to the motion picture fun makers and his work should be duly appreciated.

"The Matinee Idol" (Powers).—A portion of this picture, at least, is taken from a scene in David Garrick, where the actor attempts to cure a stage struck girl of her infatuation for him by appearing at a dinner drunk. The denouement is different, but so far as this portion is concerned the scene is similar. The combination of circumstances by which a society girl is discovered by her lover in the rooms of a popular actor makes a story of unusual human interest and develops some interesting situations. But when explanations are made the fault is seen to be hers. The Powers company has worked out the various parts with much discretion and have made an interesting film.

"The Little Blind Girl" (Eclair).—A very tender and emotional drama, centering around an unfortunate blind child, who has been cared for by her mother's sister since the mother died. There is the possible introduction of a new mother into the home, which causes complications. However, the bride-to-be reveals a greatness of soul which causes her to renounce her possible happiness in favor of the aunt. There is a thrilling rescue from the front of a locomotive by the aunt, which stirs one's emotions. Then comes the renunciation and the disappearance of the bride as a train starts. It seems a bit twisted, but nevertheless it is so strongly emotional that it makes the eyes moist before it closes.

"The Last Chance" (Eclair).—A comedy representing the adventures of a convict who escapes, is baked in a huge loaf of bread, escapes again, but is eventually captured and returned to his cell. He lost his chance by making the plunge into the dough trough.

"You Saved My Life" (Imp).—A lively film with a series of interesting complications. Motion pictures come into the riot of misunderstanding and it finally ends with a double wedding. If, however, outside appearances count for anything the young man who married the ugly sister in return for the saving of his life apparently paid dear. However, as beauty is only skin deep, and homliness the same, it is possible that something of the singed cat attaches to the lady, and she is better than she looks. It is a long list of comical misunderstandings and holds the interest throughout.

"Judge Ye Not in Haste" (Yankee).—A strongly dramatic film which represents what a mix up fate may have in store. In this instance a perfectly innocent wife is misjudged for years, until finally the husband is made to see the error of his misjudgment and takes her back. The spectacle of the wife living on, and supporting herself with her needle, confident that eventually she will be set right is one of those strongly dramatic features which appeal to every person, particularly those who are insistent upon fair play.

"Western Justice" (Bison).—Perhaps there was justice, albeit of a very rough quality, in the early days of the republic in making horse stealing a capital crime. In this picture a specimen of this stern justice is represented. When the cowboys return it is safe to say the thief will never steal any more horses. They considered it one of those unpleasant duties they were obliged to perform, and they did it effectively and grimly as befits punishment for a crime so heinous.

"The Girl Next Door" (Powers).—A love story between a dancing girl and an artist, with a wealthy man as a suitor for the girl's hand. But when she discovers her portrait in the artist's studio she tears up the rich man's proposal and marries her lover.

"The Inconstant" (Powers).—Inconstancy such as this gives rise to humorous complications, and when a man falls in love with first one daughter, then the other, and finally with the mother the funny possibilities may be imagined. The mother finally captures him and presumably all goes well.

"Mother" (Thanhouser).—A little domestic tragedy which shows how boys are sometimes driven from home and what results from it. First, the unfortunate lad enlists one's sympathies at the beginning of the picture. The lonely mother, waiting for her son, holds them, and eventually the old woman unjustly accused of shoplifting works still stronger upon one's sympathies. Then comes the recognition and reunion after the long years of separation. It is a picture that goes direct to the heart and makes one put himself in the place of all the characters. Perhaps that magic word, mother, is the key to the whole situation.

POWERS PICTURE PLAY NOTES.

During the past week the Powers Company sent a corps of camera men and assistants to Mexico to take pictures of the Centennial Celebration in that country. These camera men have been on the hustle lately. Just a week ago they returned from Cheyenne, Wyo., where, under the direction of the Powers Company, they have been taking pictures of the Cowboys' Reunion, and last week several of them went to Cincinnati to take photographs of the Ohio Valley Exposition, grounds, parade, etc. The Powers Company report that the negatives from these various celebrations and also the films of the Buffalo Bill show which they are now working on, are all fine photographically and otherwise.

This company, during the past several months, have made great strides in producing pictures. Their product to-day is good. The alterations in the plant are about completed and they now have a capacity for turning out about 200,000 feet of film a week.

Several new members have been added to the stock company, amongst whom is Harry C. Myers, for some time past the leading man of the Lubin Company, who has made hits in all their feature films; also Miss Anna Leech, who will play parts.

AT ISSUE WITH T. R.

By A. A. Gotshall.

During the week of August 23, 1910, there was held in the city of Cheyenne, Wyo., under the direction of the Business Men's Industrial Club, a Frontier Celebration, being the fourteenth annual, and also, in all likelihood, the last event of its kind, and therefore presented on a scale of magnificence and magnitude not heretofore attempted.

Against his first determination, Theodore Roosevelt, the greatest American citizen of to-day, was persuaded to accept an invitation to attend this wonderful presentation of Western frontier life as it really existed in times gone by, by a committee of business men representing the Cheyenne Industrial Club, which met T. R. at Khartoum on the day the Mighty Hunter first emerged from his trip through the African jungles.

In fulfillment of his promise to attend this presentation of the wild glories of a vanished Western border, he arrived at Cheyenne on Saturday, August 27, as the guest of the entire Western population in Cheyenne assembled.

After reviewing the wonderful parade of cowboys, cowgirls, Indians, etc., he witnessed at Frontier Park a performance so wonderful in its stirring Western scenes and frontier events, as to call for a general summing up by the illustrious Teddy himself, as follows "The greatest frontier spectacle that could possibly be staged upon the face of the earth in 1910."

Working under exclusive contracts with the Cheyenne Committee in charge of this great Indian and Cowboy Frontier Celebration, was The Tournament Film Company, of Toledo, Ohio, a film producing company which devotes its entire time and money and energies to the exclusive production of instructive and educational films.

With its eight or ten men upon the ground taking motion pictures of this great Western spectacle for future production, the manager in charge of this corps of skilled moving picture photographers, takes exception to a certain portion of Mr. Roosevelt's speech, delivered as the opening number of the Frontier Celebration, in which he spoke as follows.

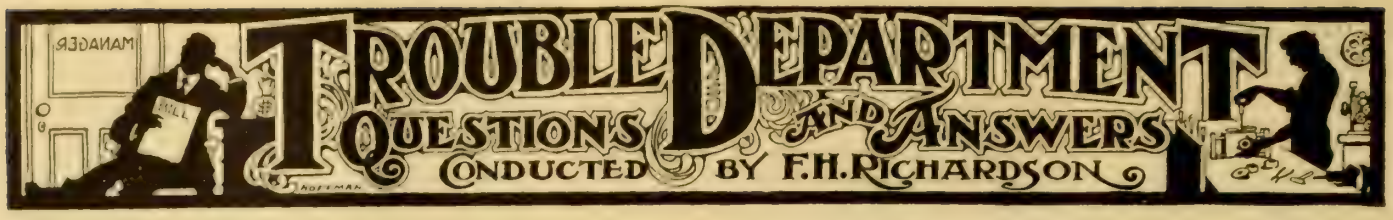
"The artists who saw the picturesqueness of the backwoodsman lacked the genius adequately to commemorate it; while the artists of real ability unfortunately had their eyes turned toward Europe, and lacked the robust originality—which the novelist Cooper showed—to see where the chance lay to do a great work. But in our generation, for our good fortune a great artist arose who was capable of seeing and of recording the infinite picturesqueness of the life of the plains and the Rockies.

Lauds Artist Remington.

"Of course I speak of Frederick Remington. He was one of those Americans who by his achievements distinctly deserved well of America.

"In Remington's pictures all the most vivid and characteristic features of the Western pioneer life which is just closing were set forth, and he has commemorated forever the men of the plains and the mountains as they actually were."

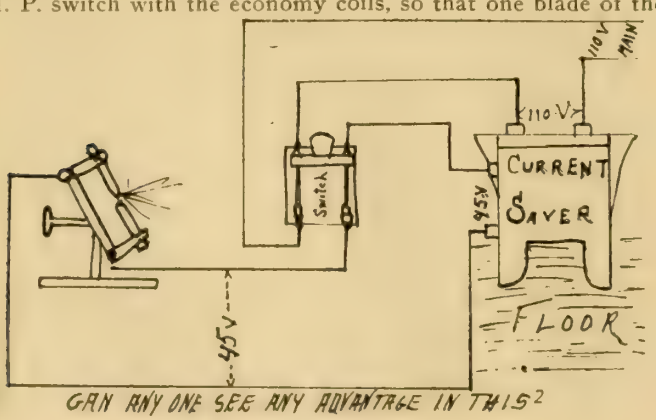
Without in even the slightest degree wishing to dim the lustre of Mr. Remington's fame and achievements, we fully believe that the motion picture producers should at least share the glory attributed to Mr. Remington. He was an artist, fired with all the artistic imagination and genius for color which he so aptly injected into his wonderful pictures; but, after all, only human and reproducing upon his can-



A Bunch of Them.—Ohio (town suppressed by request) hands us the following neatly tied bundle: "Will you kindly answer the following: (1) On a level floor would it be necessary to raise the machine above the seats? (2) Is the gas generator made by the Capital Mdse. Co., Chicago, advertised P. 474, August issue, reliable and satisfactory? (3) Can you recommend one that will be satisfactory and burn two hours on one charge? (4) Could you give me some idea of making connections in a church or hall wired for incandescent lights? (5) What kind of lens must one have to show from rear of screen? (6) Have a No. 2 lens. Could it be used closer than 45 feet and not make the picture out of proportion? (7) Could you suggest program suitable for churches? Hope to see answer in next issue of The World. Have small circuit that I think will pay. Am green but willing to learn. Have trouble setting shutter on Edison Universal. White streaks through picture. Can you suggest how to set same quickly?"

Better be careful, Ohio. The show business is not peaches and cream for even the experienced. For the novice it is likely to be cobblestones and sand. Now as to your questions: (1) Most decidedly yes, but not necessarily very much. (2) Don't know. Never saw one. Their claims are pretty stiff I would say, though all things are possible. (3) No gas machine that I know of will run two hours with one charge. The Enterprise Optical Company's Model B outfit is very good. The Edison Company also makes a gas making machine but I have no personal knowledge of it. (4) To give you adequate information would take up pages of the paper. Send the Moving Picture World $1.50 for the handbook (by the writer) which will be ready in a very few days. (5) No difference in the lenses for front or back projection. Have a thin, bleached cheesecloth curtain and set the machine somewhat lower than center of curtain so that audience won't see bright lens-spot. (6) Your No. 2 lens may be used for any distance but the longer the throw the larger will be the picture. (7) Life of Moses, Passion Play, Cotton Industry of the South, Pottery Making in Japan and a host of other religious, semi-religious and educational subjects, interspersed with clean comedy. As to your shutter, turn the flywheel in the direction it normally runs until the intermittent moves, completes its movement and barely comes to rest. Then revolve the shutter on its spindle, in the direction it normally runs, until it is just on the point of opening the aperture. It should then be very close to right. Set framing lever in center of its travel before setting shutter.

Dear Sir.—Will you please advise me where I can obtain a copy of the examination New York City gives its operators? I want to know how they class a man, whether according to electrical, mechanical or general knowledge of the machine. I am a constant reader of the M. P. World and know it to be the best theatrical publication of its kind in America; am also glad to see that The Column is rapidly increasing in size. My father, who is editor of the Helena Shield, is a very strong motion picture booster. He takes great pleasure in reading The World. While talking to an operator (?) some few days back, who claimed to be experienced in his line, he tried to convince me that by wiring the M. P. switch with the economy coils, so that one blade of the switch would break the primary, and the other blade to break the secondary of the coil, a short circuit would be impossible since the coil was protected from both sides of its terminals and furthermore heating of the coil was also impossible. I am inclosing the sketch which I made of his plan."



CAN ANY ONE SEE ANY ADVANTAGE IN THIS?

You cannot obtain a copy of the examination questions, Helena, from the very simple reason that there are no set questions, each candidate being asked those things which come to mind at the moment, one question usually suggesting another. Candidates are examined most rigidly on matters electrical, the other matters being secondary. As to the sketch, I see nothing at all in it except that the primary coil would be "alive" all the time. Just what such a scheme would have to do with either preventing a short circuit or heating of the coils I must confess I am too dense to understand. I publish the sketch for comment.

Examination Questions.—Reedley, Cal., asks for copy of the New York City examination questions applying to operators.

An examination by means of a set routine of questions would be of no value whatever, since very soon all unexamined men would be in possession of the full list of questions and examinations thereafter would be a joke. No, Reedley, we cannot supply such a list. There is none to supply.

Candle Power.—Redkey, Ind., writes: "Being the owner of a motion picture theater, I have a desire to know the candle power of an Edison Kinetoscope machine 40 feet from lamp house to screen, using ⅝ and ½-inch carbons. I would very much appreciate the favor if you will inform me as to the candle power of each size of carbon."

Redkey, you certainly are badly mixed in your candle power dates! The candle power is not figured the way your query would indicate you suppose it is. The Edison machine has no candle power at all, but from its lamp may be projected any candle power, from the lowest to the highest available, according to whether gas, calcium or electricity is used and according to how strong the light is in each case. The carbons have no certain candle power, except that as the candle power is increased the size of the carbon must also be increased, since it requires heavy current consumption to produce high candle power; also there must be a large "crater," which cannot be had with a small carbon. Many things govern the candle power available for projection. You may be actually generating 5,000 c. p., with only 1,000 passing through the condenser, due to wrong set of carbons. You may be using sufficient current to generate 6,000 c. p., but be only actually producing half that illumination because your arc is too long or too short. You may generate 5,000 c. p. and lose half of it by reason of having too large a spot. The ordinary street lamp which consumes 10 amperes of current gives off approximately 2,000 c. p., and a consumption of 10 amperes in an open lamp indicates approximately 2,000 c. p. illumination. I do not, however, believe it follows that the consumption of 20 amperes, under similar conditions, would produce an illumination equal to 4,000 c. p., or that 40 amperes would give 8,000 c. p. In fact, I don't know myself just how to gauge, or how to measure, the c. p. of a projection arc lamp. It follows that I don't know what the c. p. is, except by purely guess work. I would most heartily welcome intelligent discussion of this subject.

Homer Insulted.—My good friend Burkhardt, manager Homer Park, Homer, Ill., writes, taking me to task for saying the connection used by him (page 27, July 2 issue) was, so far as I could see, an utterly senseless one. Says he gets the light and has been complimented on its excellence several times. Asks if I ever actually tried such a connection out, or merely speak from theoretical knowledge. Says he would like very much to have me hitch up to a trolley wire, if I never tried it, and intimates that I would think I was having the time of my life.

Now, look here, Friend Burkhardt, I did not say that connection would "not do"! Nothing of the sort! What I did say was that the series was the controlling factor and that hitching on the multiple would not and could not give you more current, but, quite the opposite, ought to slightly reduce the amount which got through the series. No, I have never tried it out, but there are certain things we know to be facts, and one of them is that you cannot possibly get more current to a lamp than will pass a given resistance placed in series with it. That is what might be called a basic principle! I do not claim that the multiple would make no change. In fact, I think you will find I said it would; but I said, and still maintain, that the change caused by its introduction into the circuit would be in the nature of a slight reduction of the current. It could not possibly be anything else unless the multiple itself acted as a dynamo. I should be sorry, indeed, to lose your confidence, but in order to retain it I am not going to be placed in the position of agreeing with that which is not, and cannot be true, viz.: that a multiple connected with a series increases the current, the whole combination being connected in series with an arc. I fully realize that connecting to a trolley presents serious difficulties, not only owing to fluctuation in voltage, but also to its high pressure. I compliment you on getting results under such conditions. To make my position clear I append two sketches of water pipes. It is exactly analogous to your connection in every particular!

Would you assert that you would get more water with valve "A" closed and valve "B" open than you would with "valve "A" open and "B" closed? As a matter of fact, wouldn't you get just a trifle less with the first combination by reason of the added friction of the multiple of pipes? Please understand that water in such a connection would act precisely the same as would current in the illustrations shown (page 27, July 2 issue). It is possible that the series alone gives just a little too much current for good light and that the multiple brings it down just right. That might be true. In closing, let me say that I have not disputed the fact that you get good light from your connection. I said it was a "freak" connection, and it is! I said you couldn't get more current by adding the multiple, and I still believe you can't! I'll stand by my guns on that proposition until the ship goes down!

Carbons Set Wrong—Too Short an Arc.—Portsmouth, N. H., writes: "Have made use of many valuable pointers contained in The Column in the past. I now desire light on a few things. Have had considerable trouble trying to get clear, white light. Most of the time it has either a yellow or blue tint. My carbons don't burn evenly, but in a ragged shape at the ends. Sometimes they burn down their sides and sometimes like saw teeth, thus (see sketch). Is this the cause of poor light? If so, how may I remedy the matter? I use a Compensarc, on 60-ampere contact. Also can you inform me what to do to stop condenser breakage? I cannot keep a back lens whole a single minute! Have one in now which has been broken three weeks. It has such a nice, straight crack I dare not change it lest the next one break crooked."

As to the carbons, Portsmouth, your trouble is plain enough. You are not setting them right and you run with too short an arc. I would advise you to get the handbook, since in that work setting the carbons is described in detail and fully illustrated. I would gladly give directions here, but it would require much space and several illustrations, all of which are in the book. As to the ragged "saw teeth," they are positive evidence that you are carrying too short an arc—your carbons too close together. The remedy is: Burn a long arc until the saw teeth are burnt off and then don't get them so close again. Setting the carbons for A. C. is a very accurate, delicate operation, if the best results are to be attained. The sketch you send, if it sets forth conditions correctly, shows that your lower carbon tip is too far back in relation to the upper, the crater being formed exactly the reverse of right.

As to condenser breakage, if you will look back through former issues you will find several articles dealing with that subject.

Theater Room.—A. A. Miner, Vinita, Okla., writes: "Have been constant reader of the World for two years. I notice letters from my neighboring towns and will now trouble you to answer a few questions through The Column. Have been running a picture show in this little city for two years, but have been obliged to move several times. I now have an available permanent location in a storeroom 100 feet long by 14 feet wide, 16-foot ceiling. I will be able to seat 200 people, with the front row 15 feet from the curtain. What is your opinion of this proposition? What size picture would be best?"

There is no reason, friend Miner, why you cannot get along all right in that size room, though, of course, it is not ideal by any manner of means. The Bijou Dream Theater, Chicago, located in the heart of the Loop district, pays something like (I have forgotten the exact figures) $2,000 per month rent, and it is 120 feet long by 18 feet wide. You should throw a picture the full width of the room. This would, by having the top of picture right up against the ceiling, and the machine as high as you can get it, allow ample head-room under the light rays 15 feet from the curtain, so that the head of a man or woman standing up will not show in the picture. Your operating room should be at the back of the room and the machine near the ceiling, in order to keep the light rays as high as possible. You should by all means build a slope on the floor, unless the floor is already sloped, in which case you will be able to drop the top of the picture down a foot from the ceiling. It will look better that way. I think I would, if it is possible, have the exit in front, allowing no one to go out by the entrance. You can have a very heavy floor slope built on top of the flat floor without any ill effects otherwise.

Automatic Piano.—Neola, Iowa, asks: "Would you advise the installation of an automatic piano in a house seating 130? I have much trouble keeping a piano player and am considering the matter of purchasing an electric piano. Was looking at a Berry Wood instrument (electric). Can you inform me as to whether or no they are satisfactory? What would you recommend?"

Well, Neola, I hardly know what to say to you. As to recommending any one make of apparatus, that is outside the province of my work in this Column. As to the installation of such an instrument, there is always the "automaton" effect to contend with. They are too darned correct, but handled intelligently they fill the bill satisfactorily in many cases. Some prefer a really high grade phonograph to the automatic piano. The trouble with the phonograph is that it requires fully as much attention as the automatic piano. Usually only a medium grade instrument is purchased. Then when it has been installed, the manager, instead of expending ten dollars a week, or even half that sum, in records, gets stingy and runs his records until they are worn out and, incidentally, his audience is worn out, too. Get a really high class machine and expend the sum you now pay a piano player each week for records, and I think you will find the proposition not at all bad. But you must first learn how to run a phonograph. Practically every record requires a slightly, and often a much different speed to bring out its best effect. Get a machine with a speed dial, by all means, so that you may know the exact number of revolutions the record makes per minute. Pay especially close attention to the reproducer and be sure you get a good one. In the reproducer lies the whole secret of the good or the bad talking machine. Get a disc record machine. Don't have a little kid to run it! Change needles with every record. The Victor Company puts out a compressed air, power phonograph which I would rather have in a house of my own than a whole orchestra. It is simply magnificent, but it costs about $600. Another advantage you have with the phonograph, which would be lacking with the automatic piano, viz.: you can run illustrated songs. Now, Neola, I am not advising you to install a phonograph in preference to an automatic piano. The phonograph may be stale in your town and the automatic piano a novelty that would draw—at least for a while. The Rudolph Wurlitzer Com-

Ozo-Carbide Light—Kind Words.—Will Carleton, of Carleton & Chapman, whose stationery carries the legend, "We guarantee to deliver the goods because we 'graduated' from the 'booth,'" writes from Grundy Center, Iowa, as follows: "I can hardly agree with you in your answer to 'Illinois' (issue of August 27), in regard to Ozo-Carbide light. The Williams tent show used it last season. We used a large bore tip and an aluminum-coated screen and secured an excellent picture at 50-foot throw, in daylight, under an 8-ounce unlined top. Of course we used a six-foot black hood around screen. At night we were forced to use a cloth screen for the reason that the aluminum was too brilliant. . The success we attained may largely be accredited to the operating ability of Mr. Williams; still, I do not see why anyone with ordinary intelligence could not secure perfect results with the same light, as we consider it equal to an arc at the distance named. I trust you will keep up the hammering. I believe you are doing more to better the heart and brain of the business than any other man, inventors not excepted."

Friend Carleton, your words of appreciation are appreciated and valued. I am trying to do the best I know how for the betterment of the business and it is pleasant to know that one's efforts, though not as effective as I would desire, are considered of value by those I am trying earnestly to help. As to the machine named, you must remember that there is progress in everything, particularly in a comparatively new business like projection. What is best to-day may be a back number to-morrow. We must keep our eyes open and look at everything strictly on its merit, never "falling in love" with any one thing. A thing may be best to-day and we are "for" it. Next week or next month, along comes an improvement. Adopt it and thus keep up with the procession. By this I don't mean that a good machine should be deliberately thrown away to make place for one somewhat better, although the old mechanism be still far from its limit of usefulness; though if the betterment be decided I would even do that. The point is, neighbor Carleton, never, never allow yourself to get in a frame of mind to say, "This is good enough." As to the Ozo-Carbilight, personally I know nothing about it, my answer to "Illinois" being based, as I believe I intimated, on hearsay. I think you put it pretty strong when you say any kind of gas is equal to an electric arc. What I presume you to mean is that under the conditions you name you got as bright a light as was desirable, which was all one could do with an arc. Even this is more than I ever heard of anyone else doing. The operator who can claim to have produced all the brilliancy desired with gas, on a picture of even moderate size, is certainly to be congratulated. I should like an article on handling gas, by yourself or Mr. Williams, by all means. Won't one, or both of you, favor us? I must correct you on one point, however, and that is the "throw" as affecting curtain illumination. It is the size of the picture, not the throw, which determines the curtain brilliancy obtained from a given light strength. For somewhat more detailed explanation, see the handbook, or page 781, May 14 issue of The World.

Ozo-Carbilight. Nampa, Idaho, writes: "In August 27 issue I see an invitation to those having experience with Ozo-Carbilight to set the matter forth. I have handled several kinds of gaslight but have found none satisfactory to project a 6 x 8 more than 30 feet. The screen will not be bright at that distance, even with a light film. If a dense (dark) film is encountered the audience will not be able to tell what the picture is! My experience is that Carbilight and other gaslights are excellent for stereo work, but highly unsatisfactory for motion picture projection..

And now for some questions of my own. (1) I hold that I can get as good a light on an 8 x 10 picture at 85 feet as I can at 55 feet; that there will be very little difference in the brilliancy. The Other Fellow claims the picture at 85 feet will be only about half as bright! He says the light will deteriorate with the added distance. I claim it only diminishes as the size of the picture is increased. Which is correct? (2) What size condensers are best for 9 x 11 picture at 60 feet? (3) What focal length projection lens gives that picture at that distance?"

I fired, and my father ran the second engine that ever passed through your city, Nampa, in 1883. It was a side track in the sagebrush then, without a single building. Caldwell was then the only town on the railway between Mountain Home and Weiser. I fired the engine hauling material to the track laying crew from the time the track left Shoshone till it reached Burnt Canon.

Now as to your queries: (1) You are perfectly right. Ask the Other Fellow how, if a light ray is effected by an added thirty feet, it can travel some hundreds of millions of miles from the sun, pass through fifty to one hundred miles of atmosphere, and arrive on time in Nampa, Idaho? The better quality of the longer distance lens will more than make up for any slight refraction loss caused by atmospheric impurities. See the handbook or page 781, May 14 issue for detailed explanation. You have a given amount of light passing through the aperture. With an 8 x 10 picture you distribute that light over 80 square feet but with a 12 x 14 picture it is plastered over more than twice the surface. It should be perfectly plain that increasing size of picture decreases curtain illumination per square foot. (2, 3) A picture 11 feet wide at 60 feet would be projected by a lens having an equivalent focus of 4.66—practically 4½. With this lens I would use, ordinarily two, 7½ condensing lenses. Of late, however, I have been advising the purchase of two 6½ and two 7½ condensing lenses and trying them out in different combinations until the one giving best results is found. For some reason different projection lenses of the same focal length apparently require different focal length condensers sometimes. Don't ask me why. I don't know, nor do I know any one who does.

[I wish you would write me personally, Nampa, and tell me what that country looks like now. It was bleak enough in 1883. Also did Caldwell stick it out and become a permanent town? Send a view of Nampa if you can.]

A Correction. Recently I spoke of the aperture as being ¾ of an inch in height. My attention has been called to the error in that statement. The aperture is 11/16ths of an inch in height, the picture itself, center of dividing line to center of dividing line, being ¾ inch.

Canton, Mo., sends the information necessary to deal with his case, page 522, September 3 issue. He meant he could not get a good picture with less than 60 amperes when the film was dense. His fuses are ahead of the Compensarc. His wire from meter to transformer is No. 8, from transformer to lamp No. 6.

When using 60 amperes at the arc you are taking a little less than 30 from the line. Your 220 ampere meter is, therefore, overloaded by 50 per cent. You have in 40 ampere fuses ahead of the Compensarc.

There is something wrong somewhere, Canton. Forty ampere fuses would not blow on a 30 ampere load; therefore either your fuse wire is not 40 ampere as you think, your Compensarc is delivering more than 60 or you have a very bad ground between the fuses and the Compensarc. Probably your fuse wire is really 30 instead of 40. That would account for it all since 30 ampere fuses probably would hold for a time under your load and then blow. Have a larger meter put in, install No. 6 wires from meter to transformer, test wires between meter and transformer (Compensarc) for ground. Your plain fuse wires are just as good as any other kind, if properly put in, they being outside the operating room and properly protected. I would print the sketch but I am too badly crowded for space this week.

Swindling Fake "Schools." Boston, Mass., writes: "Have noticed several articles in The World about operators' schools. Several places here run 'Operators' Schools' but they seem merely to be get-rich-quick schemes. The student makes a payment of $15.00 to $25.00 and all he receives is a few sheets of typewritten paper and an idea he is an operator. Very few 'students' are able to pass the examinations for license. Enclosed find clipping. They look far from sincere but to those who do not know they seem O. K. Taylor's ad. states everything clearly except that only citizens of the U. S. A. are granted license in New York State. It seems to me there are a good many operators to each position. I actually know of one man who took a course, got a license and went to work at $5.00 per week."

Boston, I do favor rightly conducted schools under present conditions. Swindling outfits should be prosecuted. I invite open criticism of their methods. I lecture one hour each day at the Taylor School and get paid a weekly sum for so doing. That is the beginning and end of my school connection. This much I will say, however: the Taylor course to the personal student is complete and bona fide and is well worth the money. The correspondence course is in my opinion worth to any operator the five dollars Mr. Taylor charges. I have made my position clear in this matter before, I think. What I want is to see the operator himself take the course. If there are any swindling outfits in Boston I believe the Boston union could easily collect evidence, upon presentation of which the public officials would act. Even though conviction were not had the publicity would kill the tricky school proposition deader than a door nail.

I would respectfully suggest that the union appoint a committee, supplying them with funds to have some one take a "course." Let the committee have some one pay for a "course" and proceed with the matter until evidence of the fake (if fake it be) is in hand. Then let the committee demand action by the State's Attorney, or other proper public official, take the matter into court and see to it that it gets plenty of publicity.

Owner Operators. Ashland, Oregon, writes: "For several months I have been an interested reader of The Column. Have had in mind the asking of some questions but have hesitated. One thing I would very much like to point out, viz: do you realize that in many instances some man, like myself, has invested money in a theater not at all intending to operate the machine himself but, later, being literally forced to do so or lose his investment? For instance: when I bought into "The Star" I was obliged to agree to accept the services of a certain operator. He was inefficient and in other respects undesirable and left me without notice when I bought out my partner. It was utterly impractical to employ an operator, consequently, I, who never had touched a machine, was forced to run one the following night.

I am rather proud to say the audience did not know the difference; and that for the past four months I have been able to produce more creditable work than do the men at the other two theaters, who have years of experience.

But just the same I well know I have lots and lots to learn. Experience is a good teacher but fearfully slow!

Now what I wanted to point out is this: there are very many men who are obliged to operate their own machines. They can scarcely be classed with professional operators. There is more than one difference between them. As a general proposition the "professional" knows it all, while the other class is eager and willing to learn, as a general thing. For their sake I hope that your book will soon be issued and that it will give us details and advice in plain, simple language."

As a general thing the owner-operator is more eager to learn for the simple reason that good work means more money in his pocket right away. Yes, Ashland, I fully realize that hundreds of small houses in small towns could not exist and pay an operator a decent salary—enough to get a high-class man. The business simply is not there to justify such an expense. It is therefore up to the owner to run his own machine but it is also up to him to learn all he possibly can about the art of projection. It is not surprising that you could equal the performance of a mediocre operator, assuming that you knew anything at all about projection. The operator you describe probably did not care very much for perfection whereas you were keyed up to the last notch of nervous tension in an attempt to make good. Also it is not surprising that you are able to excel the performance of the two other operators since it is quite possible they are of the usual self-satisfied sort who expend more brain power on scheming how to make their work easier than they do how to make it better, while you, fully realizing that excellence of projection means added patronage for your house, are bending every energy to perfect your work.

Good work and good pay for good work is my system. One thing which has discouraged professional operators in the past is the fact that too many managers do not know good work from poor while others want good work all right but are not willing to pay for it. They will kick like thunder about paying the operator whose excellent work increases the patronage fifty dollars a week, five dollars more than the crank turner, instead of encouraging yet further effort toward excellence by voluntarily paying the man a bonus of ten dollars above the picture butcher's salary. I do not mean the figures as arbitrary expressions but merely to illustrate proportions.

Santa Barbara, California, is nearly as far distant from New York City as one can get and yet remain in the States. From a very neat copy of daily program of La Petite Theater in Santa Barbara we note that the proprietors of this theater have exceedingly up-to-date and pleasing ideas as to "how it should be done." The following items copied from their program shows the right attitude in moving picture theater management: "No pictures will be exhibited that will offend the most refined taste." "We cater to the entire family, striving at all times to preserve that which is instructive, entertaining and amusing." The Moving Picture World wishes all such managers more success and prosperity, which they deserve and, we believe, will get. Eclair, Imp and Yankee reels give variety to the moving picture part of the program and, judging from the numbers, the musical part of the entertainment in this theater at least receives it proper care and recognition. Entire change of program every Monday, Thursday and Saturday should satisfy the most exacting public of any city.

Chicago Notes.

Mr. C. C. Pyle, until recently manager of the Standard Film Co. is now in the service of the General Film Co.

Mr. Watterson Rothacker, the "Billboard's" popular Chicago representative, has returned from a visit to New York City.

Mr. H. J. Sigel and wife of Virginia, Minn., were Chicago visitors this week. Mr. Sigel is a member of the firm of McLean & Sigel, who operate the Bijou and Grand Theaters in the above named city.

The American Film Service exchange has been purchased by the General Film Co., but for the present their offices at 77 Clark street will be retained.

That the Independents are ever hopeful for the future of the moving picture "game" is proven by the fact that new manufacturers are springing up in every corner. The latest addition to the already large fraternity of independent manufacturers is a new company being launched by Messrs. Kennedy & Hamilton, formerly with the Essanay Film Mfg. Co. If both these gentlemen have profited by their experience with the very popular Essanay films, they will quickly make a mark, for the Independent market is certainly in need of good comedies.

ANOTHER MISERABLE SHOW.

On Sunday evening I visited the Pastime on Adams street. "When Old New York Was Young," of the Vitagraph Company, was on the screen. The picture was most of the time out of the frame, the light was very poor and we had several breakdowns, in fact, so many that a Chicago audience, generally very lenient, could not stand it much longer and at three different times, the spectators expressed their dissatisfaction in rapping their feet on the floor. This expression of dissatisfaction and the many unfavorable comments, did not seem to inconvenience the manager or his operator.

The film was due for the junk pile, yet the spectators were rather willing to exonerate the operator and place the blame on the manager to accept such films and on the exchange for renting out such junk. The spectators were wrong. The principal guilty man was the operator and equally guilty one was the manager, to not call his operator down.

As it was on a Sunday, the operator, to hurry up the show, was turning his machine at too high speed and Mr. Operator, instead of watching his machine, his film and his carbons, was watching the audience. Most of the time, the whole bust of the operator would be sticking out of his little window, while his hand would turn the crank. In this position, he would watch the audience, the girls, the ushers, etc., instead of paying attention to his own work. This was certainly the most careless operating I ever witnessed and I hope the manager will see that the public are better cared for with the material at his command, even if the proprietor will not provide more up-to-date service.

THE CURTAIN.

The question of a suitable curtain for the exhibition of motion pictures is badly agitating the Western exhibitors. New York is cool on such matters, as the great metropolis shows little pride in the best manner of exhibiting the pictures. Chicago is far ahead, and even comparatively small cities.

The number of mirror screens sold in Chicago and vicinity has proved to be a good fortune to many exhibitors and as good news travels fast, outside exhibitors are constantly visiting Chicago, to inquire of the merits of the mirror screen in particular and of the merits of many other advertised preparations.

The wise exhibitor seems to favor the mirror screen, on the ground that if a screen costs him $300, the said screen will last as long as the building and at the end be cheaper than the repainting of the screen every few weeks. We do not condemn the canvas screen, but the exhibitor who wants to use such must take it on himself to frequently repaint his curtain if he wishes to maintain the quality of his pictures. We have used the same argument with the white plaster lobby. A white lobby of plastic ornaments, looks very fine and attractive but gets dirty in no time and unless the owner repaints his front twice a year, he has a poor looking theater, while lobbies of marble and hardwood, although more expensive, are cheaper in the long run.

NOTES FROM WASHINGTON, D. C.

W. H. Bradley, who has been well known as a hustling film man in the Capital City, is now manager for the Washington branch of the Paramount Film Company, which has fitted up an attractive suite of rooms on Ninth street. This office is fully prepared to handle all branches of the Independent film service. The same business methods that have made the house famous in New York City will be strictly adhered to in the Capital City house; that is, clean goods, clean business methods, and a square deal to everyone.

In an interview with Mr. Bradley he said, "It is remarkable the great strides that have been made with the Independent films in the city of Washington. I can count more than twenty theaters using this service, despite the fact that figures have been recently printed to the contrary. With the advent of the Paramount Company into the Capital City an opportunity is given the Washington and southern exhibitors to show the magnificent productions of the Independent manufacturers. There has been a cry for a genuine film exchange in this vicinity and this company has jumped into the field with an exchange equipped to handle any class of business. This will enable us to give our patrons better service and increase their box receipts."

Mr. Bradley is a thorough business man, easy of approach. His short stay in New York brought him in close touch with the motion picture industry there, while the host of business and social friends he has in Washington are too numerous to be counted.

Tom Moore, at the helm of the General Film Company in Washington, has returned from a much-needed trip to Atlantic City, Delaware Water Gap, and New York, greatly recuperated in nerves and energy. Despite the fact that this was primarily intended for a vacation, free from business cares, Mr. Moore made a study of the conditions existing in the motion picture industry in various places. While at Delaware Water Gap he came upon the Biograph Company taking some pictures of the beautiful scenes to be secured in this vicinity, which will be used in one of its plays.

Mr. Moore says that he finds that business has in no way lagged during the summer months and that at this point there is a great increase over last year. Already he is preparing for the Fall hustling. While in New York he visited a number of the manufacturers. Mr. Moore has been in this business for a number of years and has made a study of advantages of co-operation of exhibitor and exchange and of the use of vaudeville with motion pictures, on which subjects he will give some authorative facts shortly.

Mr. Wm. Mack, who was in charge of the Moore Film Exchange during the absence of its manager in the north, is enjoying his own vacation now.

The "nameless theater" which held a contest for its title through the columns of the Washington Times, has been christened "The Leader." Manager Gwynn is doing a thriving business, demonstrating the appropriateness of the new name of his house.

The Casino has just opened its door for its Fall and Winter season, using several motion picture plays on its program. Manager Mayers is much interested in the picture features.

The necessity of attractive posters before the doors of the moving picture theaters has opened a field for the "lightning artist." Small pictures and even the posters furnished by the manufacturers are not sufficient for the keen competition that exists among these houses. The hurrying public demands something bright, new, and startling to call attention to the programs of the day. Some of the posters seen on the streets of Washington are really works of art. And they must be done in a hurry, too, free-hand and strike the key-note of the subject. A man who has recently entered into this field is L. C. White, formerly with the Tom Moore Film Exchange, who now has his work rooms located over this establishment.

NOTES FROM SAN FRANCISCO.

City Health Officer McNutt urges the passage of an ordinance under which no permits should be issued or licenses renewed until the Nickelodeon had submitted to an examination by the inspectors of the Board of Health and made the proper showing as to the facilities as to ventilation.

Attention was called to the fact that most small nickelodeons are improperly ventilated and points out the danger of spread of disease, particularly of consumption.

The ordinance as drafted by the Board of Health provides for ventilation system large enough to completely change the air in the auditorium each ten minutes and that no upholstered seats be used.

One of the most important leases of property to be made in this city for some time was made last week. The Phelan building at Market and Mason was leased to C. Withington of the Standard Amusement Co. at an annual rental of $16,000.00. The Standard Co. will spend $20,000.00 in fitting it up a high class theater for pictures only.

The Van Ness Theater built shortly after the fire at a cost of $137,000.00 is being torn down, the owners, Gottlob, Marx & Co., having no further use for the structure, now having the Columbia Theater.

The foundations for a new Class A nickelodeon for The Levin Amusement Co., at Presido avenue and Sacramento streets, are down. This is the first nickelodeon to be erected in the heart of the aristocratic residence district and will be fitted up with two Motiograph machines, mercury arc rectofier, mirror screen, and a Duntley air cleaning plant.

Fresno, Cal., will have a new Class A picture theater as E. Freed will open his new house September 1. Mr. Freed will use licensed films only, and has the finest house in Central California.

NOTES FROM ST. LOUIS.

The beginning of the Fall season of the moving picture business here is starting in lively, regardless of the regular theaters opening up since the first of September. Every place I have visited is doing a nice business, especially the up-to-date New Neighborhood Theaters located in the residence districts throughout the city.

The Novelty Theater, located on Easton avenue, near Grand, owned by O. T. Crawford (J. F. Sweeny, manager), is one of the handsomest in this locality. This place has two floors, running pictures exclusively on the first, and vaudeville and pictures on the second, using high-class Independent film, playing to capacity nightly. Manager Sweeny is getting things in readiness to pull off one of the greatest baby shows ever attempted, which will be different from all others.

The Plaza, a real picture theater, located on Clara and Etzel avenues, is in a class by itself (which can honestly be said). This beautiful new theater, seating 750, was built at a cost of $40,000, is sixty-three blocks from Broadway and plays to capacity nightly, running three reels of licensed film and two vaudeville numbers. J. A. Townsend is the manager.

Another handsome new picture theater which will be ready to open about the 15th of September is the Easton Taylor, being erected by the Eastay Investment Company, under the management of P. J. Farrington. This beautiful little house is located on Easton avenue, at the intersection of Taylor and Easton avenues, and seats 700. It will run pictures exclusively, using first-run service, featuring music and mechanical effects (which will undoubtedly be a profitable feature, as very few houses here are using the proper effects).

O. T. Crawford has under construction three new houses which will be completed about the first of November. These houses will all be combination, running pictures and vaudeville; they are located on Grand and Junietta street, Union and Easton avenue, and Twentieth and Breeman, all residence districts.

The Grand Arsenal Theater, located on Grand and Arsenal street (Grand Avenue Amusement Company, managers), is one of the handsomest houses in this locality, using pictures exclusively and doing a capacity business always. This company also owns and manages the St. Charles, located in the business district, and the Maffet Theater, Vandevetter and Maffet avenue. All of these houses run licensed film and illustrated songs.

A NOVEL IDEA.

Several years ago, Messrs. Baker and Moore established a chain of theaters located in the larger cities in Illinois and have recently extended their operations to adjoining states. They adopted the name "Colonial Theater" for all, have followed the Colonial type of architecture, and have incorporated as the Colonial Theaters Co. The furnishings, service and equipment are all first class. They now have eleven Colonial Theaters, nine of which are equipped with Motograph machines. It is indeed gratifying to note the tendency toward improvement in all branches of the industry.

THE JONES DUPLEX CHECK GATE.

Manufactured by the Jones Change Register Company, 18 Broadway, N. Y. C.

This is a piece of mechanism for checking the admission of the general public into moving picture houses, ball grounds, fair grounds, rinks, amusement parks, etc., etc., giving in the counting an accurate total of the number of persons paying an admission fee.

"Unlike a turnstile the gate requires to be locked only when, for non-payment by a person or some other special reason, the operator desires to prevent the passage of any person. It is entirely unnecessary for the operator to unlock the gate for each person as is done with a registering turnstile, and, consequently, he is at liberty to give his whole attention to receiving money and making change accurately. The locking is instantaneously effected by a simple touch of the lever and requires no strength."

We recommend all our readers who operate moving picture theaters to address the Jones Change Register Company at the above address for particulars of this invention, which is designed to assist them in checking the number of admissions into their houses. In a future number we shall have more to say on this check gate, with illustrations of the mechanism.

AGFA FILM CEMENT.

The Berlin Aniline Works of 215 Water street, New York City, are putting a special film cement on the market which has the valuable property of firmly splicing either non-inflammable or inflammable film in such a manner that the portions so joined will not become detached. The cement is easily applied, dries quickly and is most lasting in its effects. We recommend those of our readers who are engaged in the joining up of films to send for a bottle of this cement which can be had at twenty-five cents for 2 ounces or $1.50 per pound. We have heard members of the trade speak approvingly of the valuable qualities of this film cement, which has only to be used to form a permanent feature in the laboratory of every maker of moving pictures.

INADEQUATE PICTURE WORK IN BROOKLYN.

Why is Brooklyn always so behind? It is a common saying that she is non-progressive and too conservative. Surely her associations with New York ought long ago to have enabled her to be equal with the larger borough in many things, but in moving picture work there ought to be no difference between Fourteenth and Twenty-third streets in one borough and Fulton street in the other. The difference, however, is wider than the continent, for surely in San Francisco they have better "houses" and later pictures than are here "across the river." Visiting several of these places last night (September 5), the writer found no pictures of later date than August 20, the others being much older. In some instances the operation was bad, the sprocket holes being often visible on the screen. As a rule the music was poor, the musical or illustrated songs were in poor taste and badly rendered; once the otherwise beautiful pictures were spoiled by a cracked lens.

The music itself was a puzzle. For what purpose is the military drum? If ever an instrument was out of place, surely that drum is here; besides, in playing the instrument the drummer proved a nuisance with his noise and din.

In an Indian or military scene the drum may be made a useful or even necessary accompaniment, but in one "house" the drummer chose to be perfectly silent in a military scene, while he inflicted a most intolerable noise on his hearers when a quiet home scene was on the screen. In all the places from Borough Hall to Flatbush the management was poor both in choice of pictures, musical renderings, music and operation.

The "houses" themselves are not sufficiently ventilated. Electric fans are useless where there is no outlet. An old store may be made very clean and attractive, but it proves a poor place for a large company of people. But what about the theaters? The writer is almost tired of visiting them. The vaudeville spoils the picture. Please read carefully this experience of the writer: "I have never yet seen any indecency in a moving picture. I have never yet seen a vaudeville performance without indecency."

Noticing the probability of later pictures in a theater (not far from the Borough Hall), the writer proceeded there, only to find that whereas two senses had been sufficient to test the nature of the places visited—i. e., sight and hearing—in this place smelling had to be brought into requisition; for immediately upon entering, the hot, sickening smell was so nauseating that a hasty retreat to fresh air was necessary.

W. H. JACKSON.

INTERESTING LECTURE.

At Keith & Proctor's Fourteenth Street Theater is a lecture on Japan well worth hearing. While the lecture itself is little more than a rehash of information well known, the lecturer tells the story well and talks clearly enough so that everybody in the house can hear him, a quality well worth emulation wherever the program includes a lecture.

But the slides deserve more than a passing comment. Whoever made the original negatives, and they are unmarked so it is impossible to determine, understood the art of making slides out of the ordinary. Each one, with perhaps three exceptions, is a gem. It is so striking in some way that it holds the attention as long as it is on the screen. The peculiar use of tree trunks and tree branches to add to the illusion of distance giving, in effect, a stereoscopic picture, is so striking and entirely out of the usual record slides used in illustrating a lecture of this type that there was no wonder the lecture was applauded.

The colorist performed an important part in increasing the slides' value. The sunset scenes, for example, were done by a master. No one else could have caught those evanescent lights which illuminate the Western clouds as the sun disappears behind the horizon. This lecture marks such an advance over some that it deserves special mention.

Lockport, N. Y., September 5.—Your correspondent looked in at the old Walton roller skating rink on Walnut street, this morning, and found it a hive of activity, being rapidly transformed into the new Temple Theater, for light vaudeville and moving pictures. H. F. Thurston is the proprietor, and he is fitting it up in the most approved style. The house is 130 feet long by 64 feet wide, with seating capacity of 1,200, of which almost 200 is in the gallery at the front end. The stage is 30 feet deep by 50 feet wide. Terra cotta and light buff are the colors in which the Temple is finished. There are eight boxes on the sides of the stage, surmounted by marble pillars. The house operator is to be S. E. McKernam, and an Edison machine is being installed. Mr. Thurston personally will manage the Temple, which opens on Monday, September 12, and he anticipates plentiful patronage for Lockport's first ground floor theater. Bronze mounted, wax finished chairs are being put in, and a system of exhaust fans is to be installed. E. G. S.

KALEM NOTES.

"A Leap for Life" is the title of the Kalem Indian picture announced for September 16, and is another of the French Canadian in which the Kalem players have been so successful of late. The story is a pretty one and is well worked out by the Kalem players. The scenes in the Northwest are admirably portrayed both in selection of background and the work of the camera artist.

In "The Little Mother" the Kalem players present a story of New York tenement life contrasted with that of the farm. The sentiment running through this film is most beautiful and the Kalem players have done it full justice.

"Mrs. Rivington's Pride"

Released Thursday, September 15th

Mrs. Rivington's pride would not permit her to explain that the necklace her husband had given her had been loaned her brother to tide him over financial stress and she leaves the house, stung to the quick by her husband's unjust suspicion but a clever maid brings it around all right and they but love each other the more. Length about 500 feet.

On the Same Reel

"Resourceful Robert"

Resourceful Robert proved his title when the father of the girl he wanted to marry said "no" and added other unpleasant things. Robert merely arranged a fake rescue, claimed the girl—and got her. A capital little farce of about 425 feet.

Released Monday, September 19th

"Zeb, Zeke and The Widow"

Zeb and Zeke were cronies until the widow came to spend the summer in the sleepy country town. Zeb and Zeke both fell in love with her and their flirtations were as ardent as tney were humorous. Then the widow went back to town and in the double sting came a renewal of the old friendship. A scream. About 925 feet.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

A MOHAWK'S WAY.—Indefatigable in the extreme was the Mohawk; excessive in his expression of gratitude, he is equally determined in his quest for vengeance justice, however, being his incentive. Highly emotional, he possesses the power of dissemblling to such an extent, as to ascribe him stoical. This double nature is clearly shown in this Biograph story, which gives it a Cooper atmosphere. Dr. Van Brum, the white medicine-man, is a being totally devoid of fellow feeling, in fact, a contemptible despot. The Indian medicine-man has failed to cure the little papoose, over whom the brave and his squaw bend in abject anxiety. The medicine man incantations proving fruitless the brave decides to seek the white doctor's aid. Van Brum refuses to waste his time on this Indian, and in reply to the poor fellow's earnest entreaties, knocks him down. The doctor's wife, however, hears the Indian's pleading and surreptitiously goes to administer to the fever-stricken papoose. The remedy is in the form of pellets, a bottle of which the good woman leaves with the squaw, with the injunction to give the baby more at regular intervals. The little one convalesces immediately, and the innocent squaw looks upon the bottle as cabalistic. In fact the entire tribe regard it a supernatural charm, and so hold it in awe, the squaw hanging it by a chain around her neck as a fetish. This in a measure, sets to rest the enmity that has existed with the Indians for the doctor. His tyranny has made him an odious neighbor. This condition of peace does not last long, for the doctor offers an insult to the squaw while she with others are cavorting on the river bank. She resorts to the bottle's charm for protection, but at this the doctor laughs, until she draws a dagger. The doctor, a coward, is thwarted. The Indians, upon hearing of the episode, declare war, and start after the doctor, who has fled with his wife on horseback. By a short cut the Indians waylay the fugitives and the doctor, after an exhibition of his despicable cowardice, meets his just deserts, while the wife is carried to the camp where she is about to suffer the same fate as her husband, when the squaw appears and in gratitude demands her release. This the braves are loath to do until she holds up the mysterious medicine bottle, the sight of which strikes terror and they withdraw. The squaw and brave then escort the woman to the river where she is taken aboard the old ferry and carried across to safety in the British camp on the opposite side.

IN LIFE'S CYCLE.—The mother is the real guardian angel of the child. Her guiding hand and tender care mould our character and make us, if we adhere to their precepts, the upright men and women we should be. Consequently what a disastrous thing is the loss of a mother by young children. There is the father you would say—yes, but he does not understand the shaping of their little minds, building their natures, though he would lay down his own life for their good. This is the sad condition of the two children in this Biograph story. James Mullen, living in retirement at his country villa since the death of his wife, finds consolation in the love of his two children, Clara and Vincent, aged ten and twelve years respectively. It has been their custom to visit their mother's grave and place a wreath of flowers upon it. Seven years later, the children now grown, Vincent leaves for the seminary to study for the priesthood, while Clara undertakes to console their father, promising not to forget their mother's grave. Vincent, now a seminarian, writes to his sister of how happy he is in the call of the church. Clara, while returning from the post-office, whither she had gone in quest of a letter from Vincent, meets a handsome young man from the city. This stranger immediately lays siege to her heart, which feeling is more than reciprocated by Clara. She yields to the temptation to meet him clandestinely and during these meetings the stranger tries to persuade her to elope with him. At last she consents, and leaving a letter for her father, runs off to the city with the tempter. Vincent has a premonition of something wrong and hastens to his father's side where he learns the truth. He breathes a prayer for her deliverance, but she is made to suffer for her false step. She goes through a purgatory ten years with this man who not only denies her the right to the name of wife, but subjects her and their child to abject poverty, he drinking up what little she earns. In a drunken brawl at the saloon he falls against the rail of the bar, injuring himself fatally, but before he dies, he, in a measure, makes reparation by marrying Clara. During all this time, Vincent has attended to the mother's grave, begging her interception before God in his sister's behalf, the whereabouts of whom he is ignorant. After the death of her profligate consort Clara takes her little one and starts off to make a last visit to her mother's grave. Here she falls prostrate, praying for help and forgiveness. In this position she is found by Vincent who arrives on his regular pilgrimage. At last his prayers have been answered for later, Vincent, Clara and her little one are folded to the old father's breast.

AN UNSELFISH LOVE. Our hero having been refused because of his lack of wealth by the father of the girl whom he loves, determines that he will overcome that difficulty and sets out to make a fortune by farming in Western Canada. He leaves his home, carrying the love of the daughter, but no hope is held out to him by the father that he can ultimately succeed. We see him after his arrival at Strathmore, Alberta, where he takes up farming on the advanced scale with which it is carried out in this part of the country. Among his earliest acquaintances is a lady by no means unattractive, but of the type and age which is popularly designated as an "old maid." She immediately takes a great fancy to John and on every occasion of their meeting presents him with a few flowers. At first his kindly nature feels only amusement, but after a while her attentions become quite unwelcome, particularly as visit after visit to the village post office finds no letter waiting for him from his loved one at home. Shifting back to the town which he left, we find that Mr. Willmere, the father of the girl, Mabel, now has very ambitious plans for his daughter, because of the fact that a very wealthy suitor, Mr. Moore, has entered the field. The old man's determination goes so far that he actually prevents a letter which Mabel has written to John, from being sent. We see John in the various stages of his successful farming, continually being followed by the spinster lady, Miss Gray. It is evidently a bad case so far as she is concerned. Finally matters come to a climax. Mr. Willmere being determined that his daughter shall marry the man of wealth, causes to be inserted in the local newspaper an item to the effect that John Martin having succeeded in Strathmore, has become engaged to a Strathmore belle. The sight of this item temporarily at least turns Mabel's love to pique, and the other suitor being coached to make advances at just this time, is accepted by her. Soon afterwards John, on one of his frequent visits to the village post-office, finds, to his great delight, a letter, but his joy is turned to the deepest grief when upon reaching the attractive home which he has made for Mabel and opening the envelope, he finds it to be a wedding invitation announcing the forthcoming marriage between Miss Mabel Willmere and Mr. Henry B. Moore. In utter despair he sits down and starts a heartbroken letter to her, but is interrupted in the middle of it by the approach of Miss Gray. Feeling that his nerves cannot stand the strain of meeting her just at this time, he hastily leaves the room, leaving the half-written letter with the wedding invitation and Mabel's portrait on the table before him. Miss Gray entering with her customary floral offering and finding the room vacant, soon discovers the articles on the table. In a few moments the whole truth is revealed to her, and here her noble heart, though beating under an old-fashioned exterior, becomes evident. It takes her but a few moments to decide that she will try to prevent two lives from being wrecked, and immediately starts East. Just before the wedding day she reaches Mabel's home, whom she is fortunate enough to find alone. The meeting is naturally an embarrassing one, but even over this embarrassment her unselfishness and true nobility triumph and it is not long before she has acquainted Mabel with the fact that John in far-off Western Canada is pining for her. From this point Miss Gray urges upon Mabel the necessity for prompt action, and after argument, prevails upon her to immediately start for John's farm. In order to escape observation, Mabel leaves surreptitiously by means of a ladder placed against her window. Going back to Western Canada, we find John at the close of the day's work heartbroken, with a vision before him of Mabel being led to the altar by Mr. Moore. He goes to his lonely home, and, thinking what might have been, bows down in grief under his misfortune. At that moment Miss Gray enters. He greets her politely, but coldly, and not being able even yet to completely repress her fondness for him, she offers him a bunch of roses which she has brought. This is too much for his overwrought nerves. Brushing the flowers angrily away he intimates to her that he is in no condition to talk with her. Miss Gray, heartbroken herself but ever true to her purpose, goes to the door and beckons, at which Mabel enters and going to John lays her hand gently on his shoulder. Thinking that it is Miss Gray, he angrily brushes the hand aside, but upon turning discovers the one person whom perhaps he never expected to see again. Thus the two lovers are made happy, and while we can rejoice in their happiness and their acknowledgment of it to the "old maid," our joy is almost overpowered by the sympathy which we feel for her as she furtively wipes her eye and turns away. However, we may take consolation in the fact that, though she lost what she most coveted, she at least found two friends who will be true to her through life.

A JAR OF CRANBERRY SAUCE.—The story starts with the departure for the metropolis of Silas, a farmer, but nobody's fool. His wife, out of the goodness of her heart, insists on putting up a lunch for him, in spite of his protest that he is going to stop at a first-class hotel and buy the things to eat. She wins him over to her way of thinking by putting in a jar of his favorite cranberry sauce, and he takes his departure with it and a cheerful countenance in consequence thereof. Arriving in town, he is assigned to a room which has two doors, one into the hall and one to the next room. He goes down to the cafe, but finds that the prices quoted opposite the things he would like to eat have taken away his appetite. He lies him back to his room and to Mandy's lunch, which looks very good to him now. Meanwhile in the room next door a young man is reading his fourth penny dreadful and becoming very much excited over the story of the "Crime in Room Thirteen." He grows so nervous as he follows its progress that he gets a revolver out of his suitcase and puts it down beside himself, more to feel secure than with any idea of using it. Silas, munching his sandwiches, comes to the stage where cranberry sauce is in order and starts to open the jar, but the jar refuses to do its part and a struggle ensues. In the next room the young man deep in his reading hears strange and unearthly sounds through the door, groans and grunts and heavy feet moving about the carpet. He becomes nervous, goes to the door to listen and then hears muttered curses low and deep. Silas is having the time of his life with the jar. Finally with a desperate wrench the cover comes off, but the jar itself flies against the door to the next room and the contents are spilled upon the door and sill and carpet. On the other side of the door the trembling young man is listening to the apparent struggle of a strong man with his helpless victim and trying to decide whether to shout for police and thereby put his own life in danger, or to stand by and allow the crime to be perpetrated without taking a hand. And then from underneath the door sill, after he has heard the victim fall upon the floor, there creeps a red pool which adds to his certainty that he is the unwilling witness to a terrible tragedy. At this he incontinently flies, and runs to the office of the hotel, reporting the case and calling the police. In Silas' room his curses are not without reason, for he has hurt his finger, lost all of his cranberry sauce and is in a thundering bad temper in consequence. He decides that there is nothing else to do but go to bed, and has just pulled off one of his boots when there is a peremptory knock at the door and a voice bids him open in the name of the law. Taking the boot for self-defense, he opens the door and stands confronted by two officers, the clerk of the hotel, the bellboy and the brave young man from next door. They force him back, charge him with a crime, seek for his victim, and then when he demands an explanation point to the blood upon the door. At the word blood, it dawns upon Silas that the drinks are on somebody else. Dipping his hand into the gore, he applies his fingers to the young man's mouth, much to our hero's disgust. But the evidence is irrefutable, and the picture closes with his precipitate retreat before the officers and the other members of the searching party can take their vengeance upon him.

ALMOST A HERO.—It begins with Percy behind a ribbon counter and shows his longing to be a man of deeds and of valor. Of course, his reason for this is his desire to be admired by the pretty girls who come to the counter to buy ribbons and laces from him. We see how the desire works out as he goes into training with all of the physical culture apparatus known and with prizefighters and baseball players as models to work to. He even learns marksmanship with the revolver to be sure of playing his part well when the occasion for very valorous deeds arises. And it does arise, for soon we see him on the street, the accidental observer of a pickpocket plying his nefarious trade and a pretty girl the victim. Percy dashes to the rescue and seizes the scoundrel by the collar, but instead of acting as any well-regulated pickpocket should do and making a desperate effort to retreat, this pickpocket stands up to Percy and abuses him roundly. He is soon joined by two other vociferous gentlemen, who hurl anathemas upon Percy's unprotected head until he feels that the pickpocket is a more popular character than the honest man. Finally it is forced upon his consciousness that he has walked into the taking of a scene in a motion picture, interrupted the camera's work, and is thereby making himself decidedly unpopular. He is too disgusted to apologize, but swallows his chagrin over this first attempt at heroism and beats a retreat. Another opportunity soon appears, for, walking in the park, he sees a young woman, heavily veiled, attacked by two desperadoes, who struggle with her on a flight of stone steps, apparently with the intention of abducting her. He draws his trusty revolvers and calls upon them to throw up their hands. They do throw them up, but in his direction, taking his revolvers away from him and again pointing in the distance, where he sees another motion picture camera and where he recognizes the same friends upon whose operations he had intruded only a short time before. He resolves to be more careful next time, and the next time is not long in coming. A young woman in a lonely place in the park goes to the edge of the water, stands waving her arms distractedly and then plunges into the dark depths of the river. Percy, throwing off his hat, dives in after her and, although he cannot swim, tries to drag her to shore. For the third time the motion picture people appear upon the scene and for the third time Percy finds himself a victim of misplaced confidence. He can't swim and he is obliged to accept the help of the lady to escape from the water, after which a friendly policeman takes him gently by the collar and leads him away, to the evident satisfaction of the motion picture people. The last scene shows a lonely country road; a

A MOHAWK'S WAY

Biograph Subject of the James Fenimore Cooper Type

The Mohawk tribe of Indians are a people seldom portrayed in drama or picture and yet no family of the red race was more prolific of romance and interesting episode. This subject tends to contrast the sincerity of this type of aborigines with the type of the white race he first came in contact with. A white doctor refuses to aid the fevered papoose of a Mohawk, but his wife ministers and cures the little one. The doctor goes further in his tyranny by offering a gross insult to the squaw. Resenting this the tribe declares war against the whites and the doctor gets his just deserts, while his wife is guarded and carried to safety. The scenes were taken in the vicinity of the location of some of Cooper's tales.

IN LIFE'S CYCLE

The Persevering Prayers of a Brother Answered

The flesh is weak, hence avoid the occasions of temptation. The widowed father of two children—a boy and a girl, finds consolation in their love. The boy growing into manhood enters the seminary to study for the priesthood, the girl remaining to care for their father. She meets a young man from the city who impresses her to such a degree that she elopes with him only to be deceived, for he is a contemptible profligate who only makes reparation at his death by marrying her. During the years they are together she is made to suffer for her false step. After his death she starts out to make one last visit to her mother's grave and there pray for forgiveness. Here she meets her brother, now a priest. He brings her back to their old, almost broken-hearted father.

young girl appears and from the bushes a tramp steals forth. He sees a jewel upon her neck and decides that it would be well for him to possess it. He speaks to her with assumed politeness and she tries to get past him, but he stops her and invites her to present him with the jewel. She turns, looking for help in all directions, and then Percy appears upon the scene at the back. She calls wildly to him, he dashes down to her rescue, then suddenly the memory of past scenes dawns upon him and he stops and smilingly signs to her that he is too wise to again get into a motion picture. At this instant a burly young football player dashes upon the scene, seizes the tramp and throws him to the ground. The girl promptly embraces her preserver. Percy, applauding, comes down, congratulates them upon their realistic acting, and then learns to his unending sorrow that he has missed the one real opportunity of his life, that the tramp was a real one, the girl was a real one, and the hero was a real one, while he was only a might have been.

HANK AND LANK—JOY RIDING. In this instance our friend Hank, the little fellow with the big ideas, longs for an auto ride and communicates to Lank a plan by which they may obtain one. The suggestion he offers is this: They will spot a good car and when the chauffeur is near Hank will throw a fit and the sympathetic Lank will induce the chauffeur to take his stricken friend to the hospital.

The scheme works perfectly. Hank approaches the car, is suddenly stricken, and doubles up spasmodically in an awful epileptic fit. Lank is the first on the scene and waves violently to the driver of the car. This latter proves sympathetic and offers to get Hank to the hospital with all possible speed.

In another moment Hank is ensconced in the soft, pillowy leather and enjoying the sport like a millionaire. But, as they near the gates of the hospital Hank has thought twice and leaps out of the machine unbeknownst to the driver, who hurries on, supposedly with his sick man.

Later he finds Lank and tells him about the joy ride. Lank is enthusiastic and anxious to try the scheme himself. They locate another car and Lank goes through with his stunt. Unfortunately for him, however, the machine they have chosen is that of a doctor, and when this latter examines Lank he quickly discovers that the tall fellow is shamming.

Without the least hint of being hep, the M. D. hurries out his medicine case and doses the unfortunate Lank with the bitterest herbs in the pharmacopoeia. But this is not enough, and with the aid of the chauffeur he holds Lank prostrate on the ground and reaches for his surgical bag. The sight of a long, treacherous-looking knife is enough, however, to induce Lank that he is not sick, and breaking away from the M. D. and his assistant he beats it wildly down the street, while Hank looks on, hugely enjoying the joke.

THE PONY EXPRESS RIDER.—"Pony" O'Brien, or Number 3 of the relay between two desert bound Western cities, draws his horse before his sweetheart's house and lingers somewhat longer with his packet of mail as he tells her the good news of a raise in salary which means they will soon be ready to marry. The girl is delighted and her father, coming on the scene, congratulates them and gives them his blessing.

"Pony" is hardly on his way again when Jim Allison, a puncher employed by Holmes, the girl's father, approaches Mary and hesitatingly asks her to marry him. At the girl's refusal and her confession that she is already engaged, Allison turns angrily on his heel, fully resolved to leave the ranch. He looks up the old man and tells him his intentions. Holmes coolly hands him his pay and asks for no explanation. Allison, he believes, is not trustworthy, and his going is good riddance.

Some time later Allison is stopped by two highwaymen, ordered to dismount and is dragged off by them through a winding, rocky defile which ends abruptly in a small cavern. Entering the cavern, Allison makes out in the uncertain light the vague figures of a half dozen men who spring to their feet and draw their revolvers. The appearance of the other two, however, puts them at ease, and their attitude of defense gives way to curiosity.

Allison soon learns that the leader of the gang is "Red" Batterson, a bandit, whose name is the terror of every household in the vicinity. Batterson asks him to choose between death and loyalty to the gang, and Allison chooses the latter.

The next day the bandit puts him to test by ordering him to "get" "Pony" O'Brien, the express rider. Allison mounts his horse and rides away, fixing his destination at the post station where he knows "Pony" will make his start on the long ride through the mountains. "Pony" is soon seen to mount his horse, while Allison watches and sets out cautiously on his trail.

At a lonely place in the mountains he overtakes the rider, orders him from his horse and viciously knocks him senseless with the butt of his pistol. A second later, with the express rider's bag, he mounts his horse and fears down the trail to the rendezvous of the bandits.

Batterson is pleased with the success of his new recruit, but is doubly surprised when the latter, opening the flap of the mail bag, sees something which causes him to suddenly change his purpose. Quick as a flash he draws his revolver and with the surprised crowd covered he backs out of the den, leaps on his horse and rides away.

He finds the rider still unconscious by the side of the road and hurrying off through the bushes brings back his hat full of water which soon revives him. "Pony" mechanically feels for his gun but the other man waves it back. "I want that picture of Mary," he says, indicating the photo of Mary, pasted inside the rider's bag flap. Then he goes on to explain his love for the girl, his rejection by her and his short career as a bandit. He don't want to go bad, he wants the picture of Mary to keep him straight.

"Pony" gives him the picture, stretches out his hand and then the two part.

A CLOSE SHAVE. Mr. Marc and his wife are at breakfast when the butler announces an early caller and renders his master a card bearing the name of a Mr. Bunco. When Marc hurries into the reception room he is greeted by a gentleman of prepossessing appearance, who, after a warm handshake, introduces himself as the agent of the Silver Sucker mine. He has heard that Mr. Marc is seeking a profitable investment and was advised by a friend of Mr. Marc's to see this latter. The gentleman offers other credentials, but the mention of the friend's name is enough for the unwary Marc, and he refuses to put the gentleman to such an inconvenience.

At length it is arranged, and Marc informs the gentleman that if he will call at his office at 2 o'clock they will close the deal.

Mr. Marc wears a beard, and on his way down town he suddenly resolves to shave. And a half hour later when he bumps into an old acquaintance on the street this latter refuses to recognize him, much to Marc's amusement. At his office when he enters his stenographer looks at him strangely and tells him abruptly that Mr. Marc has not arrived. And it is some time before the young lady can be persuaded that this clean-shaven chap is her employer.

At 2 o'clock the agent for the Silver Sucker is on hand and the deal is closed, Mr. Bunco leaving the office exultantly with a large-sized check, while Mr. Marc is the possessor of some extravagant looking stock certificates which could not possibly be worth less than 5 cents each.

At the bank Mr. Bunco is refused payment on the check and is advised to bring Mr. Marc over to identify him. Shortly after the two gentlemen enter the bank, but the cashier, a personal friend of Mr. Marc's, stares at the little man peculiarly and suspiciously and desires to know what sort of a sucker he is thought to be.

Mr. Marc is in a rage when, after he has visited Smith, a real estate man of his acquaintance, he is told to get out. He meets even sorrier treatment when he calls on Brown at this latter's office. Here the janitor is called in and Marc is thrown out the window into a rain barrel.

In a rage Marc goes home to change his clothes and to tell his troubles to his wife, who, at first, is also skeptical about his identity. Finally, however, she volunteers to accompany her husband to the bank and identify him.

A strange thing happens when they are about to enter the bank. Mr. Bunco is being ejected by the watchman and is seized by two policemen who "identify" him as "Con" Coe, alias George Stick, wanted for bogus mining deals. The picture ends in Mr. Marc receiving his check and congratulations from the cashier of the bank.

A LEAP FOR LIFE. The story is vouched for as a real incident gleaned from the early history of Canada during the period when the French voyageurs were in constant contact with the redmen along the border. As the story goes, a trapper, one of the group working for the Hudson Bay Company, while on night watch in camp accidentally kills a friendly Indian, mistaking him in the dim light for a bear. The trapper is entirely innocent of animus towards the Indians, but this does not help matters, and the relatives of the dead Indian determine to take revenge into their own hands. They bide their time and one day when the trapper is alone they round him up, and his only avenue of escape is a leap for life from a cliff in the rocks. He makes the leap, but without success, although he catches the sumbery on the opposite side as he falls to the depths below. The Indians suppose he is dead and that their vengeance is satisfied, but his inanimate body is discovered by an Indian girl, who nurses him back to life. This Indian girl is of the same tribe as the Indian who had been killed by the trapper and she succeeds in establishing peace, and in return the trapper takes her to the Jesuit priest and makes her his legal wife.

THE LITTLE MOTHER.—As the story goes a prominent Connecticut farmer out of the goodness of his heart offers to take some tenement children from the Fresh Air people on a two weeks' vacation. His invitation is extended to a young shop-girl who is earning her own living and that of a little brother and sister, and the tenement house section in which the life of the little mother is portrayed is as characteristic of the proper phase of New York life as has ever been shown, and from the little back tenement the characters are taken to the open country, and on the farm they are received as honored guests rather than as objects of charity. The little mother's personality [illegible] the farmer's son promptly falls in love with her and the romance seems to be proceeding smoothly when a girl from the neighborhood deceives the little mother with a false report and she goes back to her tenement, sad-hearted and disappointed. The farmer's son, however, learns of the deceit and promptly goes to New York, rescues the little mother from her tenement and takes her and the children back to the farm to stay for good.

THE WAY OF THE TRANSGRESSOR IS HARD

The Crime.—A confidential secretary, hard pressed for personal funds, overpowers a bank messenger and obtains a goodly sum. The messenger is hidden in an office safe.

His Wife Discovers the Deed.—In the course of their search detectives call upon the guilty man at his home. They come, however, for information only. Now, however, he becomes so frightened that he betrays himself to his wife.

Heartbroken.—She is broken in spirit, confides in the family and requests their aid. A brief consultation proves there is no opportunity whatever of proving the husband innocent.

A Way to Avoid a Criminal's End.—His old father, though heartbroken because of his boy's crime, would still aid him to avoid the legal consequence by supplying him with a revolver, trusting him to make his own punishment.

Waiting for the Report.—Now, while the guilty man's little daughter prays for him the family in fearful agony wait the end, the partial vindication of their name.

His Courage Fails.—Struggle as he will with himself, he cannot bring his courage to the sticking point. His cowardly agonies are awful to look upon. A powerful warning to every man who sees the film.

The Arrest.—When his fear has conquered and he is about to flee the police arrive and he is forced to leave his sorrowed family.

ROBERT, THE DEVIL.—The Terror of the People.—Because of the appearance of a strange demon in the sky.

Duke of Normandy Banished for Helping a Condemned Man.—The condemned man proves to be Satan in disguise.

The News Arrives at the Castle.—Where Robert's servants flee from him.

Driven from the Country.—The Duke is forced to leave his estates.

Although Robert has lost his weapons by gambling he accepts a challenge to fight for the honor of a dumb princess.

His Squire Borrows the Sword of the Duke of Cerus.—This squire Satan uses all his influence to make trouble for Robert.

The Victory.—After a short contest Robert wins the encounter.

Cerus Wins the Credit.—Using as proof the armor and sword which Robert used.

Robert Finds a Flower Which Heals the Princess.—Acting on the advice of a necromancer Robert braves a host of wicked spirits and obtains the healing flower.

The Vindication.—The Princess, now able to speak, announces her champion.

AN EASY WINNER.—The Quarrel.—About a woman of course.

Challenge.—According to the prescribed rules of the highest society. Accomplished with painful dignity.

Substitute.—One duellist decides to hire a friend, who is possessed of greater courage than he is himself.

Disguising.—The substitute is made into a perfect likeness of the cowardly beau.

Arrangements.—Carefully completed by the seconds of each party.

Gentlemen, Are You Ready?—The battle, which is magnificently won by the hired duellist.

The Cause of the Duel.—The maid arrives to see and admire the grand finale.

I am not the Man You Think I am.—When she congratulates the victor and assures him of her love, he finds it impossible to maintain his disguise but still holds the girl.

A POWERFUL VOICE. A Room With a Piano, Please.—An irresistible appearing guest arrives at a small hotel and orders this style of room.

One Hour Later.—His voice, heard throughout the building, is of such sweetness that guests and servants neglect their business to listen.

In the Street.—Here by the power of his voice, he commands vehicles and buildings at his will.

At the Restaurant.—A short song wins him especial service.

At the Cafe.—Here strangers insist upon treating him and waiters curse themselves.

The Sequel.—Policemen have no power against these lungs and readily grant all the possessor asks.

AN UNSELFISH LOVE

A Story of Western Canada

The first of the pictures taken on our trip over the Canadian Pacific Railway. The wonderful possibility of farming in Western Canada are shown combined with a novel plot which has a real "heart-throb" at the end. The story shifts from the East to the farm and shows how a young man finally won his bride by the self sacrifice of an "old maid."

A JAR OF CRANBERRY SAUCE

Or the Crime in Room 13

A farmer putting up at a hotel, not used to the city ways; a young man given to reading sensational literature; a noise in the next room as of a struggle; a pool of blood which trickles under the door—and there you have the plot. Comedy of the kind that makes you laugh.

ALMOST A HERO

Percy was a youth whose unkind destiny it was to preside over a ribbon counter. His soul aspired to deeds of heroism and that each of his attempts came to nothing was really not his fault but that of the moving picture men whose work he interrupted. And then alas! When he did have an opportunity he let it go by. Uproaringly funny.

fluence of his benefactor, the journeyman obtains a position.

Six Months Later—Rivals.—Fate has ironically made the two chums rivals for the hand of a mutual friend.

A Noble Heart Rescuer of His Rival.—One of the men enters the quarry just as blasting operations are about to commence. His comrade rushes forward and saves him, but is fatally injured, and as he dies he joins the hands of his comrade and the girl. A fine dramatic story based on the heroism and self-sacrifice which is so frequently displayed by humble folk.

THE TRAMPS.—If I See Another Woman Kiss You I will Throw Vitriol at You.—The landlady of an inn sees her husband flirting with a girl, and threatens to throw some vitriol over him, if he does not discontinue.

She forthwith obtains a wine bottle full of the poison.

Two Good Customers.—The vitriol by accident is given to some tramps. The mistake is discovered, the inkeeper and his wife are arrested, and the tramps are followed.

Consternation reigns supreme in the lives of the poor tavern owners.

We Have Poisoned the Men.—They fully believe they have been guilty of criminal carelessness and are enjoying real contrition.

Give Us the Same as Before, Please.—The tramps are found unconscious, and when revived are offered the best wines in the inn as a recompense. This does not satisfy them, however, and they ask for more of the liquor supplied them before. To pacify them their request is granted, but the onlookers are amazed to find that no ill effects follow, beyond a further advance in intoxication.

G. MELIES.

IN THE MISSION SHADOWS.—John Stuart, a young business man of the East, comes to San Antonio to locate for the good of his health. While walking about the city he sees an old Padre, or priest, fall from sunstroke. Young Stuart runs to his assistance. At the same time, Marion, a young heiress, is passing in her automobile and stops to lend aid to the stricken man. They lift him into the auto and young Stuart is invited to ride with them to the Mission, where the priest lives.

Thus an acquaintance is formed which ripens into an engagement between Marion and John Stuart. Marion's aunt strenuously objects to this alliance, but through the interposition and kindly offices of the old Padre, who has become a close friend of the young couple, they are soon married.

A child is born to them, but does not live a great while. The husband is very much depressed by the loss of his little one, leaves his sorrowing wife and goes out in the hills to shoot game and divert his mind. The wife does not enjoy being left alone and feels neglected; she determines to follow her husband.

While making his way through the woods, the young husband meets a bewitching Spanish girl who is attracted by him, and, to secure his attention, pretends to sprain her ankle. He assists her, and, as she is unable to walk, he lifts her in his arms and carries her across the stream. His wife appears, immediately concludes that he is unfaithful, and refuses to have anything more to do with him. Their home is broken up and the young couple separate.

Again the old Padre is appealed to by the young man, and, although he is sick and dying, the old man tries to bring them together by writing a letter to the wife informing her that her husband cannot live without her and hopes she will return to him. Marion receives the letter, is greatly distressed and goes to her child's grave in the garden of the Mission and comes across the newly made grave of the old Padre, who has died and been buried near the grave of the child. She thinks it is her husband's and kneels weeping over the little mounds of earth. The young husband visits the graves of his child and his old friend and there sees his wife, whom he lovingly approaches and tenderly touches on the shoulder. She looks up at him as if he were an apparition. He holds out his arms and she draws closer and closer to him until folded in his arms they are happily reunited in wedlock's fond embrace under the shadows of the old Mission.

PATHE FRERES.

A GOOD GLUE.—Mr. Nocash, down on his luck and his rent in arrears, makes a thick concoction in a saucepan. The advent of the bailiff interrupts him and he places the saucepan on a chest. A little of the mess adheres to the piece of furniture and when the bailiff, in making his inventory, comes to move it, he finds himself stuck fast. His assistant has a similar experience, and it dawns upon Nocash that he has made a big discovery. He takes the glue into the street, sets up business on the sidewalk, and does a brisk trade in the sale of his production. The efficacy of its adhesive qualities is fully tested by various purchasers, one of whom glues his future mother-in-law to her chair, in order to run off with the daughter; a second lures a passerby to climb a sticky lamppost, whilst he calmly rifles his victim's pockets, and a third glues a policeman to the ground. Ultimately all the victims congregate upon the scene, firmly attached to various cumbrous articles. Firemen come to their aid with powerful jets of water, and the fury of the little crowd breaking loose. Nocash is punished and glued with a dab of his own preparation above the door of his domicile.

THE TWO SISTERS.—Marion and Ella were left orphans at an early age, and were looked after by their aunt, Mrs. Manning. At the time this story opens they were respectively nine and seven years of age, and their young lives were far from happy, for their aunt made them do all the housework and gave them plenty of cuffs and rebukes in return. One day Mr. and Mrs. Simm, being anxious to adopt a young girl, called and the two sisters were placed upon their best behavior and made to look pleasant. Marion was the one selected, and she is taken by the Simms and installed in their luxurious home as their daughter, while Ella is left, despite Marion's tears and entreaties, to continue [illegible] time drudging with her aunt. Ten years elapse and both girls have grown into beautiful young Manning that one day, when the latter has gone out, she leaves a note stating that she has decided to earn her own living rather than stand any more bad treatment. She has seen an advertisement in the paper for a maid, and applies for the situation and is accepted. It happens to be that it is at the Simm's home that she gets the job, but the sisters do not recognize one another. Marion's fiance is attracted by Ella's good looks and flirts with her to such a noticeable extent that Marion goes out into the kitchen and rebukes Ella and sends her about her business. This makes her thoroughly disgusted with life and she retires to her room, shuts the door and windows and turns on the gas. Meanwhile Mrs. Manning has returned and found Ella's note. She also comes across the advertisement which Ella had marked with her pencil. So putting on her bonnet she goes to the address in the ad. She immediately recognizes Mrs. Simm and Marion, and informs the latter that Ella is her sister. Marion repents that she has been so sore at her and rushes to find her. She is found reclining on her bed unconscious. The windows are opened and air admitted and a doctor sent for. He soon brings her to, and happy days now commence to fall to Ella's lot. The young doctor is smitten by her beauty, and a double wedding makes a fitting climax to the picture.

The story is a narrative of heart beats, showing the truth of the old adage that "all's well that ends well."

THE VAGARIES OF LOVE.—Jack Taring is staying down in the country and is madly in love with Mabel Cory. Although no vows are exchanged it is easy to see that she is just as much fascinated by him and the parting is a very sad one when Jack receives a telegram from his father that they sail the following day. Two years elapse and fickle Mabel, who soon forgot Jack, is now settled down and married to Charles Goring. Jack returns and is riding through the country lanes on his horse when the animal stumbles as Mabel comes unexpectedly through a gap in the hedge, and throws him heavily to the ground at her feet with a dislocated arm. She and her husband help him to the house and send for the doctor. Meantime she has recognized her former admirer, and has great difficulty in restraining her tears. The doctor quickly sets the broken arm, and Jack prepares to leave. Mabel, however, follows him through the park and soon catching up with him they begin to talk over old times. Charles, who has followed, thinks that his wife is flirting with a stranger and is upset. His first idea is to shoot himself, but finally he decides to appeal to an aunt of his who lives close at hand. Jumping into his automobile he drives over and the sharp-witted woman soon devises a plan for testing Mabel's affections. She introduces him to a pretty girl who is staying with her, and they all three motor back to his home, where they find Mabel and Jack in a close conversation on a garden seat. Her husband, however, pays little attention and in accordance with the plan they have concocted pretends to be busily engrossed with his aunt's pretty friend. This soon disturbs Mabel, and getting sore with Jack she follows the couple only to have her suspicions confirmed that they are flirting. She returns and sobbing tells her aunt that her husband is no longer true to her and enters the house. The aunt calls the others and they all follow. She, however, overhears them and determining to give her husband a good fright, seizes a pistol and fires it off in the air, at the same moment falling into a chair and pretending to be shot. Rushing in all are cowed at the turn matters have taken and commence to administer restoratives, but she soon jumps up and begins to upbraid her husband and the girl. They soon explain that the joke is on her and she and her husband fall into one another's arms declaring that they will not be so jealous of one another in the future.

SELIG POLYSCOPE CO.

JIM THE RANCHMAN.—Jim Brandon received a wire stating he is to come West and take charge of the ranch. The change does not altogether please him, but being a man willing at all times, and able to rise to the occasion, he starts for his new work. Arriving there he looks the ground over carefully.

Discontent among the employees marks the advent of the new manager, who, with his Eastern ideas, finds himself facing a problem that is not to be solved without drastic measures. The foreman of the ranch had long since paid marked attention to Bernice, and with the turn of affairs, has hastened his suit, but she has seen in the newcomer more of her ideal, and accordingly rejects her suitor.

This brings things to a chaotic state, and the foreman resigns and the hands all go on strike. This brings Brandon's blood to the boiling point, and he clears for action, and declares himself in no mild terms.

Employee after employee is leaving the ranch. Something must be done to curb the stampede. Accordingly Jim sets a pace of things on the big ranch that puts in awe anything they had anticipated from the big Easterner, and suffice to say, carried his point admirably.

As usual, after the storm comes the calm, and in this case the Justice was summoned, the knot tied, and the big ranch was again itself.

LITTLE BOY.—A bat, a ball, a dozen boys or two are wrangling over a disputed point in our national game, when the younger of the participants feels he is worsted, leaves the game and takes his ball and bat and finds his mother on the steps awaiting to comfort and dry his tears away. The one person in all the world to cheer and soothe the childish heart, as all through his young life and to manhood she had been his hope.

Now that Dick Benton had grown to that age when he longed for his own home, he sought his schoolmate sweetheart and we soon find them married and in a little cottage all their own. Dick's business frequently called him from the city, and many times the young wife grew lonesome and unhappy.

Frank Worthing, her former admirer, took advantage of these times to press his attention. One evening the out going train was reported late; this caused Dick to return suddenly home to spend the wait with his wife, when the butler delivers a message intended for the wife, but read by the husband who conceals himself and awaits the serpent's sting. Mary, in ignorance of the late train, and overjoyed at Frank's coming, meets him with fond greeting. The husband appears upon the scene, but the prayers his old mother taught him still rang in his ears, he renounced his claim, and with a heavy heart leaves them in their clandestine meeting to their fate.

Dick suffering the pangs of bitter disappointment wanders from his home, but nothing seemed to quiet the raging mind. A kindly friend saves him from further disgrace and brings him home to his dear old mother, whose love and caresses bring happiness to his troubled mind.

THE SCHOOLMASTER OF MARIPOSA.—Old man Whey brings his two sons, Hank and Buck to the schoolmaster's cabin to arrange for their schooling. On leaving, accompanied by the Master, a riderless horse comes dashing down the road. A find Miss Williams lying unconscious by the road hurried run around the bend they are surprised to side. The Master carries her to the village hotel and provides for her attention with the innkeeper.

The next day the teacher being solicitous of her condition, calls and finds her much better, leaving some flowers and an invitation to visit the school. She does so in company with Stanchia her suitor. An admiration of more than passing notice is clearly apparent to the suitor to be mutual between the Master and Miss Williams.

Hank and Buck are bent on devilry instead of books and are seen on the school-roof pouring sulphur in the chimney and finally covering it up with a sack. The fumes were stifling and soon drive the occupants to the open. They being discovered by the schoolmaster are soundly trounced by him. Upon their return home, Daddy Whey decides with the encouragement of Stanchia that the master must be brought to an accounting. The jealous suitor urges this on and accordingly the father proceeds to the master who is left in a precarious condition, and Whey is arrested.

Three years later things have made many changes and now the once Miss Williams is the wife of the schoolmaster of Mariposa, and he has attained a great history as an artist and flourishing in the results thereof.

THE THREE OF THEM.—The strength of a story or picture is in the penetration of that most vital of all interests—the heart—and that is the secret of the force and beauty of "The Three of Them." The mainspring of life is the child; it is the axis around which all the higher and deeper motives revolve. Paternal love is the strongest and most natural. A childless home is like a ship without a compass.

It is not strange that the wife who is not a mother longs to take to her heart and home some motherless child, and that is just what Mrs. Welton did when she read in a magazine that she might take from the asylum Ernest, a little orphan boy, into her home for two weeks. Her husband is opposed to it, but does not interfere with her doing so. Gradually Mr. Welton becomes quite interested in the boy and his many little pastimes. His wife sees this and she is happy. She loves the boy dearly, and when the two weeks are ended she can hardly bear to part with him when she has to take him back to the asylum.

Returning to her home, she is heart-broken. The absence of the child robs it of its homeliness and she is depressed with her loneliness, her heart full destitute. Her husband notices her condition and he decides to go to the asylum and bring the boy back, and when his wife, who has worn herself out fretting, is sleeping, the youngster kisses her. She awakens and can scarcely believe her eyes. She clasps him to her bosom, then throws her arm around her husband's neck in gratitude for the satisfying of her heart's desire.

THE SEPOY'S WIFE. Unusual? Very! A drama written on facts during the Sepoy war 1859. A Sepoy even more taciturn and moody than is naturally characteristic hates the English rule and despises the Englishmen, whom he considers intruders and usurpers, not to mention a particular dislike for the surgeon. His spirit is rebellious, and he is ever ready to inflame his fellows against the foreigners, although he is a member of the Imperial Regiment of the English government.

His child is taken seriously ill, and his wife decides to go to the English surgeon and entreat his services in behalf of her little daughter. She finds the doctor fatigued and almost prostrated with exposure from the intense heat of the tropical climate. At first he refuses to leave his home and offers to give her a prescription to the garrison druggist. She supplicates him to go to the child, and through his wife's pleading and reference to his own child he goes with the woman, administers to the little one and restores her to health.

The Sepoy's wife is extremely grateful, while the husband becomes more bitter and antagonistic. He meets his comrades, throws off his uniform and arouses them to rebellion, assumes the leadership and starts to go out to pillage and destroy the Englishmen's homes. The wife overhears their treachery and runs at once to the doctor's home to tell his wife and child of their impending danger, then she leads them to a place of safety.

The rebels burn the doctor's house, and when he arrives there and sees the ruins he concludes that his wife and child have perished in the flames. While gazing upon the smoking pile the Sepoy's wife comes to him, telling him that his family is safe and she will conduct him to them. The insurgents attack the English garrison with a ferocity that means extermination to all hands within the fortification. The exchange of shot is fast and furious, but the besieged hold off the enemy until a company of highlanders, with pipes and kilts, notified by the Sepoy's wife, come to their relief, completely routing the Sepoys and putting an end to the rebellion.

The doctor and his wife, who escaped to the garrison under the guidance of the Sepoy's wife, now join the cheering soldiers as they welcome the highlanders within the garrison. The Sepoy woman, who brought the relieving forces into the stockade, enters with them. The doctor and his wife seize her hand to thank her for the aid she has given them. She looks surprised and says: "You saved my child. I have saved you and your child. I am glad."

THE GREENHORN AND THE GIRL.—The Greenhorn is having a delightful time learning how to be a cowboy. The more expert range riders are having most of the fun, but the Greenhorn takes it all in good part. The "Old Man" gets a letter announcing the arrival of his niece and he tells the boys. In the same envelope is a portrait of his sister, and this, being dropped, gives the boys the idea that the old lady is coming. With great enthusiasm the Greenhorn is elected to drive to town and bring the Girl back, and he is surprised, as anyone would be, when a vision of loveliness appears on the platform. But the Greenhorn is green only in spots. He persuades the Girl that the alkali dust without a veil will ruin her complexion and that is how he manages to keep her to himself on the long rides they take. The others are most willing that the Greenhorn should be her attendant though they cannot quite understand his cheerful devotion. Just to make things interesting they play at Indian and make a savage attack with blank cartridges. The Greenhorn cannot shoot straight and there is small danger of being hit, so they enjoy his brave defense tremendously, rushing in to tell him all about the joke. But the joke is on them. For the first time they see the Girl's face and it's too late. The Greenhorn's bravery has won her.

MRS. RIVINGTON'S PRIDE.—Banker Rivington married late in life and in spite of his love and her apparent devotion Rivington is not quite certain of his wife. He showers her with presents and just before a reception he gives her a handsome necklace of pearls. Rivington does not like his brother-in-law, a reckless young fellow in whom there is no inherent harm, and when the boy appeals to his sister for a heavy loan to get him out of a financial scrape she loans him the locket to pawn. Rivington finds a part of the letter of appeal which, when read by itself, suggests other than the relationship of blood, and in a fit of anger reproaches his wife. She leaves her home with their little child and for a time supports herself as seamstress. It was an unfortunate move, for Rivington regards it as a confession of error, and though his heart calls to him to bring her back his pride will not permit. Then there comes a lucky turn in the stock market, the pledged jewels are redeemed and sent to the house, the brother knowing nothing of the mischief he has made. Rivington receives the package, perceives his error and goes in search of the woman he has wronged. She is not inclined at first to condone his error, but at last she relents and is clasped in the strong arms. After all it has been a good lesson, for distrust has been banished.

THE NEW BUTLER. Two clubmen meet and decide to go out on a round-up of the Rialto. You can't go boating down old Broadway, but in spite of that they embark on the schooner that sails in the night, and after they have sailed a few up and down several sounds, one of them lets several sounds escape him to the effect that he is a jolly good fellow, and that we won't arrive at the domicile until the Arctic Borealis has started work for the day. In short, he is pretty well beaten by the beverages imbibed in the course of the evening, and his friend, who has corrected a few rounds and run away to live and drink another day, and therefore is still in possession of some of his senses, decides to take his alleged comrade home in a cab. He pockets himself in the coachman's seat, and commences the journey home. At a point in the route a young lady, assuming that he is a coachman, hails him and he, foreseeing an adventure, stops the coach and she enters. He takes her home, and is so struck with the beauty and grace of the fare that he decides to apply for the position of butler in her home, which he does successfully. The young lady gives a dinner to some of his club-members, and he is dumbfounded to see some of his boon companions arrive at the house and fail to recognize him. He appeals to them to acknowledge that he is one of them, but they pretend to be shocked at his effrontery, and when the poor adventurer is almost beside himself, a few of his friends decide to discard the jest, and they introduce him to the girl of his dreams, to whom he explains the reason for his having applied for the menial position. He tells her of his love, and, inasmuch as a bold heart deserves the fair, who shall say he does not deserve her?

DEBT.—The love for the gildings and trimmings of life, the desire for things that are fair and that bear the brand of costliness, induce the wife of a poor laborer to burden himself with the added expense of bills for goods bought on the instalment plan. One day the husband returns home and, brought to an unpleasant frame of mind from contemplation of his unhappy lot and the irony of his wife's mismanagement, he decides to return all the knick-knacks that his wife's vanity had suggested. After a heated discussion they both go their own ways, the wife taking along the little baby girl. The husband goes far away in the North, and by dint of perseverance and the struggle and strife that is part of it, he amasses a fortune. He yearns for his wife and daughter, and advertises in countless ways for them to return to him. At last his daughter, who has become a concert singer, sees outside of the concert hall the placard in which he appeals to his wife and daughter to come come; she gets in touch with her mother, and they return to him to forgive and forget all their woes and their follies, and to live in the manner described in fairy books after the strife of hearts is over.

THE LAW AND THE MAN.—Truly, Jim Bradley had enough to discourage any man; first his pack mule died, then his supplies gave out, and now, when he reached his cabin after a long, weary tramp, he found his wife and child on the verge of starvation.

But he would get food for them at any cost! Hastily kissing his loved ones good-bye, the miner fairly ran from the house, and it was with almost a start that he found himself in front of Murry's saloon and gambling house. Mechanically the unhappy man opened the door. Heaps of gold and silver lay on the table—while at home Nellie and the little one were starving!

Returning to the hall, the miner quickly improvised a mask of his handkerchief, then once more softly entered, and ere those in the room had time to realize what was happening, they were lined up against the wall and the gold was in Jim's pocket.

As he backed out, however, the handkerchief slipped from his face, so that he had scarcely time to regain his cabin, toss the money on the table with an excessive exclamation to Nellie, and dart out again, when the men from the gambling house burst open the door and demanded the gold from the astonished wife.

Upon his home they trailed him to a deserted shack, where, although he succeeded in wounding John, Kirby the sheriff, his ammunition was soon exhausted, so that when he crept out to the well after midnight, hoping without water the besieged was sure, from his blood trail, that at last the law had triumphed.

After having their prisoner with food and water, Tom Kirby and his deputies started back, but before they reached their destination the sheriff discovered that his wound was more severe than he imagined. So, sending the others on ahead, he sat down to rest.

Hardly had they gone when he lapsed into unconsciousness, and it was thus that Nellie and little Winnie, who had been out gathering wood, found him, and half carried, half dragged him to their cabin.

Here, after his wound was carefully dressed and bread and water set before him, for it was all they had to offer, Kirby was preparing to depart when his eyes fell upon Jim Bradley's picture, and the child's reply, "That is my papa," acted like a flash in the darkness, as he glanced around at their abject poverty and empty cupboard he soon realized that this was the reason Jim had held up the boys. But now time had taken money back, why not give the miner another chance? Hurrying to the gambling house, the sheriff sent out deputies for the prisoner and put the matter before those assembled. Then, not only did the men agree not to appear against the miner on the day of his trial, but gaily made up a purse, which, together with a note to Jim's wife, was thrust into Jim's hand as he started home to meet his wondering but happy little family.

AMEROSIO.

THE IRON FOUNDRY. The Countess of Savern had a handsome young page who was devoted to her and for whom she entertained a great fondness. Polatt, a wicked knight in her husband's service, had made advances to her which she had promptly rebuffed. In revenge, he cast suspicion in the mind of the Count over the innocent relations of the Countess and the youth, and by stupendous falsehood persuaded the Count to take drastic measures. Accordingly they repaired to the Count's iron foundry, where the workmen were instructed to cast into the furnace the messenger who would arrive and ask if the Count's wishes had been obeyed. The page is sent on the errand of death, but before leaving the castle meets the Countess, who has been unable to attend mass owing to the illness of her child, and she requests him to stop on the way and offer prayers for the quick recovery of the little one. The impatient knight waits until he imagines the page has been destroyed and makes his way to the foundry, arriving before the youth, and when he inquires if the Count's wishes have been carried out, he is seized and hurled into the fire. When the page gets to the foundry the workmen give him the knight's necklace, and he brings it back to the Count. The latter, by adroit questioning, soon gets to the bottom of the conspiracy, and learns how innocent and pure-minded the boy is. Stricken with remorse, he leads the page to the Countess and gently tells her to be always kind to him.

BISON

COWBOY'S MATRIMONIAL TANGLE.—Jack and Milt are brothers, Mary and Jane sisters. Jack loves Mary, Mary loves Milt, Milt loves Jane and Jane loves Jack. This picture shows how the overpowering affection of the girls convinced the men that the girl who loved him was the right little girl for him, ending in a double wedding in typical cowboy style.

Until the tangle is unravelled, many amusing incidents occur, each individual endeavoring to hold the companionship of the favored one. For a time it would appear that the quadrangular mixup would be counted as one of Cupid's failures, as the young people are estranged. The girls conceive a bright idea and write to the boys that they will marry them at once. This dispels the gloom which has fallen like a pall over the brothers, and amid great hilarity the parson is brought to the ranch. The girls laughingly contend that inasmuch as love is blind they must be married while blindfolded. Mary binds a handkerchief over the eyes of Jack and Jane does likewise to Milt. The men then perform the same duties for their respective loved ones and the girls quickly change places. The ceremony over and the bandages removed, each man finds himself wedded to the wrong girl and each girl to the right man. The men are too dumfounded to protest against the situation, and yielding to the loving arguments of their respective wives are persuaded to accept the situation. That the intuition of the girls was correct is evidenced later when the two couples are shown living in ecstatic happiness.
